For better laws and the enforcement of law a strong sentiment prevails in the land, and the progressive forces have recently won before the country a signal victory at the polls, and to-day in both Houses of Congress a majority exists, desirous of and ready for the enactment of laws responsive to this progressive spirit now dominant in the land. An effort is being made by the Democratic Party to revise the tariff downward schedule by schedule, and substantial progress has been made in the Democratic House and the progressive majority of the Senate, composed of Democrats and insurgent Republicans, acting together, are responding to the popular desire for a revision of the tariff downward; and if these forces will continue to act together, putting aside partisanship and mere effort for party credit, the relief will come and the country will give credit to those to whom credit is due. The country wants results. What party will be bold enough or stubborn enough to stand in the way? The people will not longer brook delay, but will run over or push aside the party that obstructs progress along lines of remedial legislation. The stalwart Republican will resist, backed and sustained, as it is and has been, by protected, selfish interests, and plead for delay, and ask that Congress and the country wait for reports from the so-called Tariff Board, in order that scientific revision may be had. No such cry or plea was heard when the special interests were preparing the schedules that entered into the Payne-Aldrich tariff measure. The stalwarts were not then advocates of a tariff board or commission; the necessity for a so-called scientific revision, based upon a report of facts returned by a Tariff Board was not then apparent when they were in the majority and had full control. And the cry now for delay is the cry of a political and discredited minority, seeking for some party benefit and longer enjoyment of large profits by selfish interests. If Congress, responding to the overwhelming sentiment of the country, shall pass laws substantially revising the tariff downward schedule by schedule, without waiting for the delayed reports of uncertain value of a Tariff Board, what will the President do? Will he veto or approve? He put his seal of approval upon the Payne-Aldrich tariff measure. Will he permit to become a law the tariff measures enacted by Democrats and insurgent or progressive Republicans? If not, what excuse will he offer the country in justification of his veto? Will it be for delay, till a Tariff Board can furnish the information deemed necessary to formulate a scientific tariff measure? What assurance has Congress or the country that a report will be made in a reasonable time, and, when made, that it will not be partisan and valueless? A partisan board, with limited powers under a narrow, partisan law. The country desired a broad law, with full power to gather and force information from protected interests, who refuse to give information. These same interests could furnish schedules prepared for their benefit and cause them to be written in high tariff measures heretofore enacted.

If the President should veto a bill revising the woolen schedule after having denounced that schedule as indefensible, he may find great difficulty in defending his action before the country. In his message to Congress in December, 1910, President Taft used the following language:

Whether or not the protective policy is to be continued and the degree of protection is to be accorded to our home industries are questions which the people must decide through their chosen representatives.

The President can hardly afford to veto the woolen bill, the free-list bill, and the other measures passed by Congress for mere partisan reasons. He was glad of the support given by Democrats to the reciprocity treaty, and his public utterance upon its passage gave evidence of his gratitude to the Democratic majority given in support of that measure, so earnestly advocated by him. I do not believe the President will be able to justify a veto of the woolen bill and the free-list bill and the cotton bill, if they should finally pass both Houses of Congress. If he should veto these bills, passed by large majorities of Democrats and progressive Republicans voting together, he will give evidence to the country that the same influence that caused him to approve the Payne-Aldrich tariff measure—written in defiance of his promise to the American people that a law would be enacted by a Republican Congress in an extra session substantially revising the tariff downward—still dominates and controls his action when he vetoes a tariff measure substantially revising downward the indefensible woolen schedule and other measures passed by the House and the Senate. The country hopes for an early passage by Congress of a law substantially revising downward the iniquitous woolen schedule, and will await with interest the action of the President in reference to this bill, the free-list bill, and other bills passed when passed by Congress.

The so-called "unholy alliance" that enabled these bills to pass both Houses of Congress by substantial majorities meets my hearty approval, and the country is distinctly indebted to the progressive elements in both parties for substantial progress toward better conditions.

I do not desire to be understood as being opposed to a tariff board or commission, but such a tariff board or commission should be nonpartisan or bipartisan, appointed under a law broad and strong enough to compel information, making its reports to Congress whenever called upon by Congress, the lawmaking body, the body responsible for tariff legislation, and not merely to the President, who may withhold all or any part of any report made—may control the action of the Tariff Board and delay reports and legislation for party advantage. Congress, and not the President, is the lawmaking body required under the Constitution to make and revise the laws. Let no party advantage be written in any law.

And let not the tariff laws of the land be written to furnish unreasonable profits to special interests which seek to levy tribute upon all the people by virtue of high protection. Let no law guarantee profits to any interest. The country will approve an alliance that will speedily enact new tariff laws more favorable to the consuming public.

Let me insert here a table taken from Hampton's Magazine of August, 1911, giving the names, capital, surplus, earning per $100 share, and so forth, showing enormous profits of certain New England cotton industries for the year 1907, when the Dingley tariff was in force:

Names.	Capital.	Surplus.	Earnings per $100 share 1907.	Total dividends 8 years ending 1907.	Book surplus per share.

In other years under that high-tariff law similar profits were gathered in by the owners of these New England cotton mills.

Under the Dingley tariff law the duties collected at the customhouses on cotton goods imported amounted to 53.38 per cent. This protection instead of measuring the difference between cost of labor at home and abroad amounted to more than two and one-half times the cost of labor at home. The census of 1880 showed that labor got 21.9 per cent of the value of the product of the cotton mills, or nearly 22 per cent. The census of 1890 showed that labor got 24.6 per cent. The census of 1900 showed that labor got 25.6 per cent of the value of the product. But the census of 1910 showed that labor got only 21 per cent of the value of the product. This high protection remained under the Payne-Aldrich tariff law enacted in 1909.

The average per cent under the proposed law will be 27.06 per cent, and it is estimated by Mr. UNDERWOOD, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, that over $200,000,000 will be saved thereby to the American consumer by such a revision of the cotton schedules. Shall the high rates of protection remain or shall they be sought to be reduced now, so that the law will not be a further shield for exorbitant profits?

It is asserted by the opposition that the passage of this bill, now pending in this House, and seeking to reduce the duties on the manufactures of cotton, will bankrupt the cotton industries and close the cotton mills; that these mills, especially in the South, that manufacture the cheaper grades of cotton goods, are now running with little or no profits; that the profits have disappeared. If that be true under the existing high-tariff laws, what excuse is there for longer retaining these laws on the statutes of the Nation, when the raw material is raised in this country and millions of dollars' worth of cotton goods manufactured in American mills are annually exported and sold abroad at a profit in competition with all the world? The charge that the proposed reduction will do injury to these cotton industries or to the country will not be given credit by the majority membership of this House or of the Senate or of the country or, I hope, by the President, whose veto is promised as a rebuke to an unholy alliance, And the unprotected masses of the country will have little patience with those who cry out against a so-called unholy alliance of Democrats and progressive Republicans seeking by legislation at this extra session to bring relief where relief is needed and demanded.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR].

[Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD]. [Applause.]

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the caucus [laughter]: Yes, caucus; because we are all together on these remarks that I intend to make. Following in the footsteps of our leader on this side of the House, I rise to a question of personal privilege. There are some Members on the opposite side of the Chamber who have been accusing me for the past few days of being a party to what they term a "steal," a kind of bunko game. They state that I advertised a baseball game, took their money, and then did not hold the game. Now, if this is not a matter of personal privilege, then what Mr. Bryan said about the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] was not a marker to what has been said about me upon the opposite side of the Chamber. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. It is a matter of personal profit, perhaps. [Laughter.]

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Well, coming from Nebraska the gentleman is well qualified to talk on that subject. [Laughter.] But this time the proceeds go to the Washington playgrounds. Of course, personally, I prefer that Jersey City should get them. Now, there is going to be a ball game, notwithstanding the efforts that have been made by the gentlemen of the opposition to prevent it, because we not only have a nine on our side, but we went over this afternoon and dug up nine live Republicans that we are going to play on Monday. [Applause.]

Mr. COX of Indiana. What is the price of admission?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. The gentleman from Indiana wants to know what the admission is. I am not going to tell him. He knows. He did not send in his dollar yet, either. [Laughter.] I am peculiarly unfortunate in the time that has been allotted to me. It is along toward half past 5 o'clock, and I ought to be out getting some pointers from the Washington team, and for the benefit of those who remain I want to say that the Nationals won the first game to-day, 3 to 1. [Applause.] Now, in order to be sure that the game will be properly conducted, and that our opponents will have at least a chance to win, knowing the superiority, as manifested in the past, of the Democrats in the national game, we have concluded to leave the choice of umpires with our Republican brethren.

You understand now why I addressed you as gentlemen of the caucus. However, we stipulated that one umpire should be a former Member of the House, a man who was qualified to lead the Republican forces on a memorable occasion two years ago to defeat. He has since had further honors thrust upon him and is now governor of the State of Pennsylvania, John K. Tener. He is coming down here to umpire the game, and if a Republican from Pennsylvania is not good enough for the Members on that side of the House, why we will take a Democrat from Texas. [Laughter.] He was our choice. We selected him ourselves, and then we left to the Republicans the selection of the other umpire. They wisely concluded that in order to be absolutely sure that we would get a square deal on the bases they would select the Hon. VICTOR BERGER, of Wisconsin. Mayhap this is a subtle bid for the Socialist vote. That is all that I have got to say about this matter of personal privilege, except that the game starts at 3.30 on Monday next at Georgetown oval and we want your presence and your coin.

Mr. Chairman, about two weeks ago I introduced a resolution, in compliance with a pledge made during the last campaign, to investigate a trust which finds its home in the city which sends to us the minority leader. I am not very good at adjectives, but I believe that this trust is the most iniquitous of all that have been formed and fostered under Republican rule. I introduced a resolution to investigate the Beef Trust, and I hope that the Rules Committee, to which this resolution has been referred, will find an opportunity to meet and report the measure to the House. I base my charge primarily on the establishment in the State in which I have the honor to reside of a National Packing Co., among the directors of which are one Armour, one Swift, and one Morris; and the purpose of the National Packing Co., if we are to judge by its conduct, has been to drive out of the American market any competitor that may attempt to enter the trade against it. Now, I realize that this is a serious charge, which would come back to haunt the Democratic Party unless I am able to prove it; but I am prepared to prove it. It remained for an honest Republican——

Mr. COX of Indiana. Who was he?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Name him.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. The Hon. Pierre Garven, prosecuting attorney in the county of Hudson, in the State of New Jersey, to ferret out the information on which the Federal Government has indicted all three of the men whom I have mentioned this afternoon. I have no fault to find with the men in charge of the investigation of the Beef Trust nor the work that has been done by these men up to date. I know that the Attorney General's office is overcrowded at this time with work, and in order to give them the assistance and the aid to which I believe they are absolutely entitled I introduced this resolution, and I have every hope that if it is presented to this House that not a single man upon that side of the Chamber will rise in his place and object to its going to work at once. It may be we have enough investigations going on at the present time, and I am not going to quarrel with the members of the Rules Committee if they, in their judgment, decide that the time is not opportune; but I would like to feel that during the next session of Congress the men who are members of this committee will give a free and open hearing on the question. Now, I will be perfectly fair about this matter. I have not any disposition whatever to induce six, seven, eight, or nine men to sit here during the hot weather. We are all tired of being in Washington as long as we have been. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. I notice no one has resigned.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. No; nor no Republican is apt to do so apropos of this hot weather. I must tell you this story before I forget it. An insurgent from the State of the gentleman who broke into my remarks so abruptly at the outset, the gentleman from Nebraska—no; this insurgent is from Kansas—five weeks ago came up here to talk to a school at the graduation of some of our boys and girls. Modesty forbids my saying that the principal of the school made a wise choice in the gentleman whom he asked to present the gentleman from Kansas. I introduced him by stating to the audience that I had to apologize for his appearance and my own. We were harnessed up in dress suits and the night was hotter than it is here, much hotter, with these fans going. I called up in the afternoon and asked the principal how he wanted us to dress. "Well," he said, "if you do not mind, I wish you would get on your dress suit." So I dug mine out and I told MURDOCK he had better get on his. It was very hot there and I kind of threw open my vest. I remember there was a boy who lived on the street near me who had gone out in the country, and this little chap was something of an aristocrat; he had always worn pajamas when he went to bed. [Laughter.] He got out into the country, and his aunt told him it was time for him to retire, and he said, "All right, Aunt Mary; will you get me my pajamas?" and she said, "Why, Willie, we have not a boy in the house, they are all girls; I'm sorry I can't give you any pajamas."

And little Willie put up an awful cry. She said, "What can I do? Great Scott, we haven't got any pajamas! There are no boys in the house, and you have got to wear Cousin Anna's nightgown." "Well, I'll tell you," he said, "before I'll wear Cousin Anna's nighty, I am going to go to bed raw." [Laughter.]

Now, I am not going to embarrass the gentleman from Kansas, because he is not here, and I want him to defend himself. I will tell the rest of it when he is on the floor.

Now listen. This is the important part of my talk to-day. We are going to have this investigation. I have voted for a good many good Republican measures in my day, and very seldom have I ever had to ask a Republican to vote for any measure of mine. I want to ask the men who are gathered here to-day to vote for this measure. They are the right kind of Republicans. Any man who will sit here during the session to-day, when there is a double-header being played, is entitled to reelection, and I do not care if he is a Republican. [Applause and laughter.]

Now, this is going to come before the Rules Committee——

Mr. OLMSTED. Could you not get it to a vote now right here?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I would like to ask the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, if we could suspend the rules? I do not believe we will ever get as many good Republicans and as many Democrats as we have here to-day. [Laughter.]

Now, I am perfectly willing to share the credit of this resolution with them. And my parliamentary inquiry is whether it is possible for us to-day to suspend the rules and report in this resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion of that kind will not be in order.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. It is suggested that I take an appeal from the Chair. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman that that will be ruled out of order as dilatory.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I was not going to do it anyway; I am regular in all things, particularly in politics, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman who got us into trouble on the 17th of March two years ago says that you are worse than the czar that was in the chair then. [Laughter.]

Now, I wish to be serious for a moment. I see I have only 10 minutes left. I do ask for, and I feel that I am going to get, the support of all right-thinking Republicans on this question. Now, it is really a matter that concerns the American public more closely than the cost of steel rails. Meat goes into every home, so does sugar; and I am glad that they are investigating the Sugar Trust; but I will stake my political future that I can prove that the Beef Trust has taken dishonestly more from the pockets of the American workman than even the steel kings or sugar barons.

The papers spell my name wrong at times. They spell it K-I-N-K-A-I-D, and they print a picture of my illustrious namesake for my own. The Judge and I understand each other. When I was married two years ago, in one of the farm journals that is published in the State of Nebraska they printed his picture for mine and said that he had been married in New York, and the Judge has been busy from that time to this denying the allegation. [Laughter.]

I want to say that I do not think that all of the men that have been named in my resolution are guilty in the eyes of the law. I am not saying that they are not guilty. I do not believe that the Cudahys nor do I believe that the firm of Schwartschild & Sulzberger are guilty in the eyes of the law; but I do insist that since they have been named so often in the days gone by on the Republican side, as well as on this side, as being parties to that combination they should welcome the investigation in order to show the American people that they are clean.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I make it out that I have three minutes remaining, and I ask unanimous consent that the three minutes that I think are coming to me be allowed me. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not extend the gentleman's time, because the time is under the control of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes additional to the gentleman from New Jersey.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for three minutes longer.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I do say, gentlemen, that we have every right to go into the affairs of all of the firms that we believe are in any way connected with this infamous trust. It is not my purpose to do an injustice to any man who has raised the packing interests of this Nation to the position that they occupy in this country to-day. I have the highest respect for the business ability of an Armour and for the business sagacity of a Morris and for the business wisdom of a Swift, but I say that our duty to our people in our districts is to go into this matter fully, and if we find that there has been a conspiracy against the Sherman antitrust law, indictment should only precede a term of imprisonment; and I pledge you my word that just as soon as one of these men has undergone a term of imprisonment, from that moment the price of meats and meat products in this Nation will fall. [Applause.]

I have no desire to make political capital out of this inquiry. I believe that these men are guilty. I believe that I can prove that these men are guilty. I want the opportunity. If the committee of investigation is appointed, I will endeavor to name Mr. Garven, the honest Republican who has fought the trust, as our attorney for the committee. Our policy will be to protect the innocent and to punish the guilty. No honest packer need fear the investigation, and no dishonest one need hope for quarter. I have no respect for the beef baron who will add to his millions the dime stolen from the emaciated hand of American motherhood. I hate a thief, but I detest the rich thief who steals from the poor.

Gentlemen, this is American; we are Americans. Here is one issue on which we can all unite. Let us deal with the thieves among the packers as we would with ordinary thieves. Let us deal with the Beef Trust—the National Packing Co.—as it should be dealt with. If they are guilty—and I believe I can prove they are—put them in prison. That is the only thing they fear. Fines fall on the heads of the stockholders directly or on the heads of the great consuming mass of Americans indirectly. They do not fear fines, but they do fear jail. The square deal I ask for—the same law for all men; its application to the rich and the poor alike. That is the very essence of the Constitution—equality of rights before the law. Do not allow the directors of the National Packing Co. to use their misgotten wealth to defeat the ends of justice. Let us square our actions with the gospel preached by the founders of the Republic. Let us encourage the millions of American workmen by sending forth the message to them that while wealth honestly acquired has our respect the dishonest dollar is no more powerful to-day than it was when Jefferson set down the whole Democratic doctrine—equal rights to all; special privileges to none. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we are told by the reactionary Members of this Chamber that there is no hope of this bill becoming a law, even though it may receive the sanction of both branches of Congress. The leaders of the old guard insinuate in their speeches that the President will veto all tariff bills passed during this session. On the passage of the reciprocity bill we are informed by the Sun Bureau that Andrew Carnegie, from Skibo Castle, sent to the President the following telegram of congratulation:

Cordial congratulations upon deserved success your noble neighborly policy. Now for the treaties. Secure these; then rest. No other worlds to conquer.

This ironmaster, in this telegram, not only congratulates the President, but tells him just what work to do and when to quit, as though he were the master of the President. Why did he not content himself with cordial words of congratulation? Was he afraid that the President would do something during his absence from America for the substantial relief of the people from the high cost of living, and did he take the advantage which this opportunity afforded to remind the President that he should permit no tariff legislation until after the Tariff Commission makes its report? Did he mean to tell the President that there are really no worlds in America to conquer; that the annual ravages of the rich upon the earnings of the poor are just and proper and should not be restrained by wholesome laws?

The next day after the Senate passed the Canadian reciprocity bill one of the leading papers of this city, in commenting upon it, said:

It—

Meaning the reciprocity bill—will be the only completed legislation of this session.

On the 31st day of July, 1911, the same paper, over the heading, "Weary of Congress," said:

One would suppose, after watching the maneuvers of certain statesmen in Congress and listening to their debates, that there was a feverish excitement among the people over Schedule K, but there is not. Instead a suspicion is encountered that the hullabaloo raised in Washington is inspired rather by selfish political motives than by genuinely patriotic considerations. * * * One of the several reasons that Congress is no longer attracting attention is the existence of this very suspicion, now rapidly developing into a conviction, that certain public men are purposely dragging the session along to attain political advantage over rivals.

These quotations are typical of what is going on all over the land by organized capital to prevent any tariff legislation during this session of Congress.

Are the masters of predatory wealth in partnership with the executive department of this Government to such extent that they can dictate veto messages of important legislation and herald the news thereof to the world through the columns of the subsidized press long in advance of the passage of such bills? Or are they trying to frighten the President away from the pledges which he made to the people both before and after his election by daily holding up before him imaginary injury to the country, resulting from the passage of such bills as the farmers' free-list bill, the wool and woolen bill, and the cotton bill, now under consideration?

For my own part, I attach but little importance to these pretended mouthpieces for presidential vetoes. In my judgment they are neither the agents of the President to forecast his official acts nor of the people to slander the Members of Congress who are trying to perform their duty under their oaths, but they are calamity howlers with a hope to frighten Congress and the President away from their plain duty to the people in the fulfillment of antielection pledges.

Mr. Chairman, in the light of the President's public utterances, both before and after his election, upon the question of tariff revision, I can not believe that he will veto any of these bills which have passed, and this bill now under consideration, which will soon pass. To do so would be a repudiation of the principles upon which he was elected and place him in the attitude of a pretended friend of the people before his election for the purpose of securing their support, and an enemy to them after his election in order that he may the better serve the interests of the trusts. No man, not even his enemies, can charge him with inconsistency.

Let us examine some of his public utterances and see what was his position on the tariff while a candidate and what has been his position on that question since his election:

QUOTATIONS FROM THE SPEECHES OF THE PRESIDENT IN HIS CAMPAIGN IN 1908.

In the President's speech, delivered September 22, 1908, at Cincinnati, Ohio, he said:

Another thing the Republican Party pledges itself to, fixes the date when it will do it, and tells you how it will do it, is the revision of the tariff.

The Dingley tariff has served the country well, but its rates have become generally excessive. They have become excessive because conditions have changed since its passage in 1896.

Farther on he says:

Every schedule ought to be arranged so that the tariff on the products, of the factory, farm, and mine, shall be equal to the differential between the cost of their production in this country and the cost of material, the cost of labor, and the manufacturer's interest and profit.

It is not an easy thing, of course, to reach this difference. The examination to be made should be fair and impartial between the manufacturer and the consumer.

Now, Mr. Bryan is greatly concerned and says that no such tariff revision can be made in view of the fact that the protective industries control the Republican party. I deny this. * * *

The movement in favor of revision has arisen within the Republican Party and is pressed forward by members of the Republican Party.

The revision which they desire is a revision which shall reduce excessive rates and at the same time preserve the industries of the country. It took some time, as it always does in a party, to crystallize this sentiment.

It has been crystallized, and the party is determined to see that this revision shall go on by fixing the date when it is to begin and prescribing the rule by which it is to be carried on.

I wish there to be no doubt in respect to the revision of the tariff. I am a tariff revisionist, and have been one since the question has been mooted.

The Members of Congress who are elected this time are to be elected by constituencies that, we may infer from the action of the Republican convention, are strongly in favor of a reexamination and a revision of the tariff.

Under those circumstances we have a right to say that the revision will be made upon just and fair lines, and that the plighted faith of the party will be carried out as formulated in the platform. (Cincinnati Enquirer, Sept. 23, 1908.)

Here the President tells us that he is a "tariff revisionist" and denies Mr. Bryan's proposition "that the protective industries control the Republican Party." While he does not quote from his party platform as to the tariff, which reads, in part, as follows:

The Republican Party declares unequivocally for a revision of the tariff by a special session of Congress immediately following the inauguration of the next President.

Yet, in construing this plank, he says that his party is pledged to a genuine revision made upon just and fair lines, and that the revision which he stands for is a revision which "shall reduce excessive rates." He tells the people just what are excessive rates. Listen to his own words:

But its rates, meaning the rates of the Dingley law, have become generally excessive. They have become excessive because conditions have changed since its passage in 1896.

We agree with the President, they have become excessive, and the Sixty-first Congress failed to reduce any of them in the wool and woolen schedule, although the rates on raw wool are, and have been for more than 15 years, nearly 45 per cent, and on the finished product of wool the excessive rates are, and have been for more than 15 years, nearly 100 per cent, being the same rates which were in the Dingley law at the time he made this speech. The rates on cotton goods are, in some cases, the same as fixed in the Dingley law, and in many instances they are much higher, being raised by the Payne law in violation of the pledges in the party platform and the principles enunciated by the President in this speech. Now, if these rates were "generally excessive" when the President made this speech and if they have been raised higher and made more excessive, then the reason for a reduction is even greater now than when the President declared to us that they were generally excessive and ought to be reduced.

In his second speech, delivered at Milwaukee September 24, 1908, he said:

But it is asked why it is necessary to change the Dingley tariff. The Dingley tariff has been in operation now more than 10 years. That is a period longer, I think, than the operation of any protective tariff that we have had.

It is intended under the protective system, by judicious encouragement, to build up industries as the natural conditions of the country justify to a point where they can stand alone and fight their own battles in competition with the world.

Improved machinery and training, due to our inventive genius, together with our extending home market, certainly reduce the cost of production.

Farther on he says:

I can say that our party is pledged to a genuine revision, and as a temporary head of that party and President of the United States, if it be successful in November, I expect to use all the influence that I have by calling immediately a special session and by recommendation to Congress to secure a genuine and honest revision of the tariff in accordance with the principles of protection laid down in the platform, based upon the examination of appropriate evidence and impartial as between the consumer and the manufacturer.

Farther on he says:

It is my judgment that a revision of the tariff in accordance with the pledge of the Republican platform will be, on the whole, a substantial revision downward, though there probably will be a few exceptions in this regard. (Milwaukee Sentinel, Sept. 25, 1908.)

In this speech the President not only reiterates the principles which he enunciated in his Cincinnati speech, but he goes further and tells the people that, if elected, he will "immediately call a special session of Congress" and use "all the influence" of which he was possessed "to secure a genuine and honest revision of the tariff," which "will be, on the whole, a substantial revision downward." Now, if the wool and woolen and cotton schedules have not been revised genuinely and honestly and the excessive rates reduced substantially, there is now a greater reason why they should be reduced, because the people have borne the unjust burdens nearly three years longer than they had when the President declared in unmistakable terms that they were excessive. Why should the President veto bills which have been carefully framed to secure an honest and genuine revision of excessive rates substantially downward now, when he pledged himself to stand for such reductions of excessive rates nearly three years ago? Such vetoes can not be justified unless it can be shown conclusively that these excessive rates have become reasonable because of changes in conditions which will justify their retention. This can not be done, because the changes which have been made have made the rates more excessive, and the conditions are no more favorable to excessive rates now than they were when the President made this speech.

The President goes still further and interprets the object of the protective system to be intended "to build up the industries as the natural conditions of the country justify to a point where they can stand alone and fight their own battles in competition with the world." This is the doctrine of protection to infant industries during their struggle for development, and if protection can be justified at all the application of its principles to encourage new industries and enable them to become self-sustaining may have some foundation in justice and reason, but the President says in substance that when they have become full-grown they should stand alone and fight their own battles in competition with the world—free trade for the strong, protection for the weak.

In his speech at Des Moines, Iowa, on September 25, 1908, the President said:

The party is pledged to a genuine revision, and as the temporary head of that party and President of the United States, if it be successful in November, I expect to use all the influence that I have by calling immediately a special session and by recommendations to Congress to secure a genuine and honest revision of the tariff in accordance with the principles of protection laid down in the platform, based upon the examination of appropriate evidence and impartial as between the consumer and manufacturer. * * *

It is my judgment that a revision of the tariff in accordance with the pledge of the Republican Party will be, on the whole, a substantial revision downward, though there probably will be a few exceptions in this regard

As the temporary leader of the party I do not hesitate to say, with all the emphasis of which I am capable, that if the party is given the mandate of power in November it will perform its promises in good faith. (Des Moines Register and Leader, September 26, 1908.)

Here the President reiterates his Milwaukee speech almost verbatim, and in doing so we may take it that he was in deep earnest and wanted the people to understand that he was laying down a policy which would be carried out in good faith for the relief of the people. Listen to the additional solemn statement which seals forever the question of his sincerity of purpose:

As the temporary leader of the party I do not hesitate to say with all the emphasis of which I am capable that if the party is given the mandate of power in November it will perform its promises in good faith.

The President not only pledges himself to stand for the substantial reduction of the Dingley excessive rates, but he pledges that if given the mandate of power in November, 1908, his party would, in good faith, stand for an honest, genuine revision of the Dingley excessive rates substantially downward. Now, if the Sixty-first Congress failed to carry out this pledge of the President on account of the differences between the leaders of that Congress and the President, and instead of lowering the excessive rates increased them in many instances, and in others allowed them to remain excessive without change, will the President now refuse to stand for a substantial reduction of these excessive rates because a Democratic House and a coalition Senate have honestly framed and passed bills for a substantial reduction, which is what the President tried to get his party in Congress to do? Would he have signed such bills had they been passed by the Sixty-first Congress? If so, then he certainly should not hesitate to sign them now, for the necessity is more urgent now than then. He did not hesitate to approve the Canadian reciprocity bill when passed by a Democratic House and a coalition Senate. I have the confidence in the President that he will deal with these bills as fairly as he did with the reciprocity bill.

In his speech at Topeka, Kans., October 3, 1908, the President said:

The principle of protection is that all industries that need it shall be protected by a customs tax equal to the difference between the cost of production here and the cost of production abroad.

The cost of production is determined by three elements—the cost of material, the cost of labor, and the interest on capital, or what is known as the "manufacturer's profit."

The normal operation of protection where competition has free scope is to lower the cost of producing and so to reduce prices to the public. As a consequence, after 10 years' operation of a particular schedule it ought to result that the cost of production in this country is made less, and therefore that the difference between the cost of production in this country and abroad is less, and therefore that the duty ought to be reduced.

If I am elected, as I expect, I shall exercise all the legitimate influence that the President or head of the Republican Party can to see to it that the plighted faith of the party on this subject, in letter and spirit, is observed.

In this speech he emphasized his former propositions by repeating them, and, in addition, he gives a very wholesome reason why the Dingley rates should be reduced, and that is, that they have been on the statute books for 10 years, affording the manufacturer a long period of ample protection, thereby giving him an opportunity to permanently establish and equip his business on modern and scientific methods, enabling him to reduce the cost of production. All of which makes the difference between the cost of production in this country and the cost of production abroad less, and for that reason the duty ought to be reduced.

In his inaugural address, the President said:

A matter of most pressing importance is the revision of the tariff. In accordance with the promises of the platform upon which I was elected, I shall call Congress into extra session to meet on the 15th day of March, in order that consideration may be at once given to a bill revising the Dingley Act.

Further on he says:

It is thought that there has been such a change in conditions since the enactment of the Dingley Act, drafted on a similarly protective principle, that the measure of the tariff above stated will permit the reduction of rates in certain schedules and will require the advancement of few, if any.

Mark you his words on this memorable occasion:

The measure of the tariff above stated will permit the reduction of rates in certain schedules and will require the advancement of few, if any.

Who will doubt that the President stood for an honest, genuine revision of the woolen and cotton schedules, with a substantial reduction in the rates, in this inaugural address?

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES COMMUNICATED TO THE TWO HOUSES OF CONGRESS AT THE BEGINNING OF THE FIRST SESSION OF THE SIXTY-FIRST CONGRESS.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have convened the Congress in this extra session in order to enable it to give immediate consideration to the revision of the Dingley Tariff Act. Conditions affecting production, manufacture, and business generally have so changed in the last 12 years as to require a readjustment and revision of the import duties imposed by that act. More than this, the present tariff act, with the other sources of Government revenue, does not furnish income enough to pay the authorized expenditures. By July 1 next the excess of expenses over receipts for the current fiscal year will equal $100,000,000.

The successful party in the late election is pledged to a revision of the tariff. The country, and the business community especially, expect it. The prospect of a change in the rates of import duties always causes a suspension or halt in business because of the uncertainty as to the changes to be made and their effect. It is therefore of the highest importance that the new bill should be agreed upon and passed with as much speed as possible consistent with its due and thorough consideration. For these reasons I have deemed the present to be an extraordinary occasion, within the meaning of the Constitution, justifying and requiring the calling of an extra session.

In my inaugural address I stated in a summary way the principles upon which, in my judgment, the revision of the tariff should proceed, and indicated at least one new source of revenue that might be properly resorted to in order to avoid a future deficit. It is not necessary for me to repeat what I then said.

I venture to suggest that the vital business interests of the country require that the attention of the Congress in this session be chiefly devoted to the consideration of the new tariff bill, and that the less time given to other subjects of legislation in this session, the better for the country.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 16, 1909.

While this message is very short, yet it speaks in no uncertain terms. What does the President mean by this language?—

The successful party in the last election is pledged to a revision of the tariff. The country, and the business community especially, expect it.

This was a warning to the Sixty-first Congress that the people expected that the party pledges would be carried out "in good faith." Listen to the last sentence of this message:

I venture to suggest that the vital business interests of the country require that the attention of the Congress in this session be chiefly devoted to the consideration of the new tariff bill, and that the less time given to other subjects of legislation in this session the better for the country.

So urgent were the needs of relief from the excessive rates of the Dingley law that a special session was called within 11 days after the inauguration of the President, for one purpose, and one purpose only, and that was to make a genuine, honest revision of the Dingley rates, with a substantial reduction downward.

Who will deny the sincerity of the President in these public utterances, and who will say that he has changed his mind since his election and his inauguration? Certainly none. Then by what authority do you say that he will veto these bills which make a substantial downward reduction of excessive Dingley rates, made more excessive by the Payne law? Who will deny that the Payne law is a betrayal of the confidence of the people and imposes upon the consumer heavier burdens than those of the Dingley law? And who will say that if the rates imposed by the Dingley law were excessive, that the rates imposed by the Payne law are not more excessive? Certainly no one. Then who will say that the necessity for a substantial downward reduction is not more urgent now than it was in 1909? If so, why should the President veto these bills?

Had the special session of the Sixty-first Congress given us a genuine, honest revision of the tariff, with a substantial downward reduction, with "few advances, if any," our labor and toil in this special session, through heat and sweat, to get an honest, genuine revision of the woolen and cotton schedules, with a substantial downward reduction, would not have been necessary. But instead of meeting the issue according to pre-election pledges, the majority of the special session of the Sixty-first Congress seems to have fallen into the hands of a few shrewd corporation lawyers, who called together the owners, managers, and representatives of the corporations and trusts and permitted them to dictate the terms of the Payne bill, contrary to the pledges of the President that the revision should be "based upon the examination of appropriate evidence and impartial as between the consumer and the manufacturer."

These learned gentlemen declared with much emphasis that the party platform declared only for a revision of the tariff. Here they employed an ingenious trick, which is the real joker in the Payne law, by resorting to the etymology of the word "revise." They said it came from the Latin and was divided into two parts—"re," meaning again, and "videre," to see—literally, to see again—and that it was just as much a compliance with the party platform to revise the Dingley rates upward as to revise them downward; that the only thing the party platform required them to do was to revise the tariff, regardless of which direction the revision was made. In this way they succeeded in passing the Payne bill, which increased the burdens upon the consumer instead of reducing them.

It was so cruel, arbitrary, and unjust in its terms that it collapsed of its own weight. Then these heroes of the Payne triumph undertook to give it some semblance of strength by public indorsement by the President on the stump; so, at Winona, the President said it was the voice of Jacob, but the people last November declared it to be the hand of Esau.

Now, these representatives of predatory wealth seek to keep and maintain this repudiated law upon the statute books by a trick equally as shrewd as that employed by them to secure its enactment. They have lately discovered that the tariff is a very delicate thing, too delicate for Congress and the President to handle without the aid of science. They have discovered that the people are fools and must have scientific education and must wait for the report of a Tariff Commission before beginning the scientific study of tariff revision. This is the big pistol swinging from the belt of every defender of the Payne rates. Thus armed, these servants of predatory wealth boldly march into this Chamber and flourish this big pistol in our faces in an effort to frighten us out of the passage of this bill.

By the use of this same big pistol they expect to frighten the President away from his plain duty to the people. It is the net in which they hope to bag presidential vetoes to every tariff bill passed this session.

It did not require scientific evidence from tariff commissions to build a tariff wall high above the wants of the people around every manufacturing industry in the country—so high that we can not see the top of it. Any old Jake was smart enough to take an active part in the construction of that wall; and that, too, without criticism from the subsidized press; but now we are confronted with the startling news that there is no living man who is smart enough to act as a Moses to lead us out from under the bondage of our cruel commercial taskmasters. That our only hope depends upon the future success of the big pistol in securing information for us; that we must wait until it does secure the proper information for a report, and that if it never reports we are never to get any relief. Wormwood!

This scientific business is nothing but a joker, invented by the enemies of honest tariff revision, with which to fool the people again. Scientific experts often make bigger blunders than the everyday common-sense man. The jury system is the most satisfactory way of trying a lawsuit, yet the members composing the jury usually come from the rank and file of the common people, and as jurors they are required to pass upon the facts and the law. The evidence of a lay witness is usually to be preferred to that of an expert scientific witness, and, as a rule, such evidence is much more satisfactory and convincing.

On the trial of a man (Lutgurt) a few years ago in Chicago, charged with the murder of his wife and the destruction of her body by throwing it in a soap vat, expert doctors were called to identify some small pieces of bones taken out of the soap vat, with a view on the part of the prosecution to prove that they were parts of human bones. On cross-examination it is said one of these expert doctors identified the bone of the leg of an ape as the femur bone of a woman.

Henry Ward Beecher is said to have told a story on himself which illustrates scientific methods in doing common-sense things. He had a farmer friend living in the country, where fishing and hunting were good. On receiving an invitation to visit his friend for an outing, he provided himself with a scientific outfit for scientific fishing. On the next day after his arrival he and the farmer appeared side by side on the banks of the big swimming hole to try their luck—Beecher with a scientific pole scientifically constructed in scientific sections, provided with a scientific reel scientifically attached to the scientific pole of scientific sections; to this scientific pole and scientific reel was scientifically attached a scientific line made solely for scientific fishing; the scientific line was provided with scientific sinkers scientifically fastened on the scientific line; a scientific float scientifically constructed and scientifically fastened on the scientific line, and scientific hooks scientifically arranged in groups and scientifically fastened on the end of the scientific line and scientifically baited with a scientific bait; the farmer with a hazel bush for a pole, a common piece of cotton staging for a line, supplied with a rifle ball for a sinker, the end of a corncob for a float, and a common fishhook baited with a common earthworm. As they cast in their lines Beecher said: "Now, I'll show you the difference between scientific fishing and common fishing." The farmer replied: "Very well, we'll see." Soon the farmer began to throw out sunfish, and then came a big trout more than a foot long. Beecher lost his temper and cried out: "That's not scientific fishing!" The farmer replied: "I know it's not scientific fishing, but it's fishing."

Mr. Chairman, the President did not need the assistance of an expert Tariff Commission in shaping the reciprocity treaty with Canada, neither did he have cause to wait for the report of such commission before urging Congress to enact this treaty into law, yet by its terms the entire product of the farm is placed on the free list. I submit an extract from his message to Congress last January, which reads as follows:

TAFT'S FIRST RECIPROCITY MESSAGE.

* * * * * * * * *

Since becoming a nation, Canada has been our good neighbor, immediately contiguous across a wide continent, without artificial or natural barrier except navigable waters used in common.

She has cost us nothing in the way of preparations for defense against her possible assault, and she never will. She has sought to agree with us quickly when differences have disturbed our relations. She shares with us common traditions and aspirations. I feel I have correctly interpreted the wish of the American people by expressing in the arrangement now submitted to Congress for its approval their desire for a more intimate and cordial relationship with Canada. I therefore earnestly hope that the measure will be promptly enacted into law.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 26, 1911.

The last sentence of this message shows how well the President was prepared to act in the matter affecting the entire product of the American farm. "I therefore earnestly hope that the measure will be promptly enacted into law." And when the Sixty-first Congress failed to pass the bill he was prepared to urge its passage again, and immediately called the Sixty-second Congress in special session for that purpose. The product of the factory is no more important to the people than the product of the farm and requires no more scientific information to regulate tariff duties imposed thereon than does the product of the farm. When this treaty was enacted into law by this Congress the President did not have a veto message prepared for its reception, but he promptly signed it and did everything within his power to make it effective.

His public utterances in favor of Canadian reciprocity are no more earnest and urgent than those made both before and after his election favoring an honest, genuine revision of the excessive rates of the Dingley law substantially downward, with an increase of the duty on but few articles, if any. If there is a just reason for the Canadian treaty, there is a double reason for the reduction of the cotton schedule.

THE PAYNE LAW DISCRIMINATES IN FAVOR OF THE RICH AND IMPOSES THE HIGHEST TAXATION ON THE POOR.

In revising the cotton schedule, justice demands that the goods usually worn by the poor people should be taxed lower than those worn by the rich. This is on the theory that the rich are more able to pay, and if there is a discrimination made, it ought to be in favor of those least able to bear the burden of taxation. At all events, it is plain that there should be no discrimination made against the poor and in favor of the rich. That is, the poor should not be taxed on the goods which they wear at a greater per cent than that placed on the goods worn by the rich. But that is just what the Payne law does in many instances. On cotton underwear, which costs more than $15 per dozen, the rate of duty paid was 50 per cent, and on the lower grades the rate ranged from 57 to 63 per cent.

STOCKINGS.

Ever since this bill was reported out on the floor of this House by the Ways and Means Committee, I have been telling my protection friends that the Payne law deals very harshly with the stockings of the poor, and on each occasion I have been told by them that the stockings of the poor are taxed at 30 per cent. I am aware that there is one kind of stockings taxed at that rate, but it is the kind that has no shape to it except that of a gunny sack. You can call it all leg or you can call it all foot. It is the same size from the top to the toe. The leg acts very generous. It will stay up for a while if tied hard and fast. But however you adjust it you soon find it down over your foot, and often it acts as a sole for your shoe. It is so loosely constructed that it will stretch large enough to hold a bushel of potatoes, and if the puppy or cat should chance to find it at night and see fit to make a plaything out of it, it is quite probable that the owner would find a bunch of ravelings the next morning instead of a pair of socks. The best that can be said of the owner of such stockings is that he is not quite sockless. No one would contend for a minute that the poor should be compelled to wear this stocking on Sunday to church, neither would anyone contend that they should be taxed out of the right to buy the more convenient grades, selvedged to prevent raveling, and shaped so as to fit the foot and leg. But that is just what the Payne law seeks to do.

STOCKINGS WITH SELVAGE AND CONVENIENT SHAPE.

The Dingley law divided this stocking into six grades:

First. Stockings which are valued at not more than $1 per dozen.

Second. Stockings valued at more than $1 per dozen and not more than $1.50 per dozen.

Third. Stockings valued at more than $1.50 per dozen and not more than $2 per dozen.

Fourth. Stockings valued at more than $2 per dozen and not more than $3 per dozen.

Fifth. Stockings valued at more than $3 per dozen and not more than $5 per dozen.

Sixth. Stockings valued at more than $5 per dozen.

The average tariff paid on the first five grades for the year 1908, under the Dingley law, is more than 60 per cent, and the rate paid on the sixth grade, or stockings valued at more than $5 per dozen for the same year, is only 55 per cent. With cotton on the free list this rate is excessive, and can not be justified on any other theory than that of robbery. Yet the Payne law did not reduce any of them, but, on the contrary, the first, second, and third grades—the poor people's stocking—the rates were outrageously increased, while the last three grades were allowed to remain the same as the rates in the Dingley law. The increase on the first three grades was raised so that the average rate paid last year was 87.06 per cent, and the average rate paid on the last three grades for the same year averaged 60.27 per cent. This is charity for the poor indeed. The poor people paid into the Treasury of the Government on the first three grades the sum of $3,149,782 to help defray the expenses of the Government last year. The rich people paid into the Treasury of the Government last year the sum of $159,807 to help pay the expenses of the Government. The sum paid by the poor people is more than 1,907 per cent of what the rich people paid.

The poorest grade of stockings, to wit, stockings costing not over $1 per dozen, were taxed at 91.23 per cent for last year, and paid into the Treasury the sum of $1,187,565 to assist in paying current expenses. The best grade, to wit, those valued at more than $5 per dozen, were taxed at the rate of 55 per cent, and paid into the Treasury the sum of $17,235 last year. Thus we see that the stocking of the poorest class of people were taxed nearly twice as much as those of the richest people, and that these poor people paid into the Treasury a sum equal to 6,890 per cent of what the richest class paid for the privilege of wearing stockings, while the poor used the coarse, rough grades and the rich used the finest mercerized grades. Is it any wonder that the people repudiated the action of Congress in the passage of a law which so unjustly discriminated against them and their children?

On last Christmas morning 10,000,000 children in America awoke, crying because of heels made sore by reason of holes in the heels of their stockings. The Payne-Aldrich law did it. Their mothers had no money to buy Christmas presents. The Payne-Aldrich law took the family savings and turned them over to the rich trusts as the manufacturer's profit. Do any of you believe that the President will veto a bill to relieve these children and their careworn and half-famished parents? Do you believe that it is right to allow this law to stay on the statute books to continue such punishment on helpless children and their mothers? Do you think more of the manufacturer's profit than you do of human happiness? Do you need scientific evidence to aid you in determining the injustice of this law? Do you not believe the plea of delay for scientific evidence was born in wickedness and sin and has no place in heaven?

Here is a sample of what the manufacturer of cotton goods thinks of profits. Read it carefully, and then tell me whether you think more of making him and his kind richer in profits than you do in relieving the toiling masses from the unjust taxation in this schedule. Tell me what you think of these fabulous sums as the manufacturer's profit, collected by a law at the expense of sore heels of helpless children.

Mr. H. F. LIPPITT, of Providence, R. I., now the successor of Senator Aldrich in the United States Senate, appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means on December 1, 1908, and testified with reference to the cotton-cloth schedules, among other things, as follows:

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not know whether I understood Mr. LIPPITT correctly to say that no large fortunes have ever been made in this business in New England?

Mr. LIPPITT. I think so.

Mr. LONGWORTH. My impression is that most of the large New England fortunes have been made in it.

Mr. LIPPITT. We are not accustomed to very large fortunes in New England.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then may I ask you what you call a large fortune?

Mr. LIPPITT. I would regard a fortune of three-quarters of a billion as a large fortune.

Mr. HILL. That would be quite a moderate one for an Ohio man, would it not?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I only asked the question because I thought it was rather an exaggerated statement.

Mr. LIPPITT. I do not think so.

* * * * * * *

Mr. CLARK. How much did you say you would regard as a comfortable fortune, three-quarters of a million or three-quarters of a billion?

Mr. LIPPITT. The gentleman asked me what I considered was a large fortune. I said I thought three-quarters of a billion was a large fortune.

Mr. CLARK. A billion?

Mr. LIPPITT. Yes, sir.

What is true as to the rates on stockings in the Payne law is true to a greater or less extent as to the whole of Schedule I. I insert the Payne and Dingley laws on the grade of stockings which I have dealt with so that the reader can see for himself the injustice of the discrimination against the poor. I also append tables of imports so that the rates of tariff in both of these laws can be compared with a view of determining whether the Payne bill on the revision is a "genuine, honest revision" of excessive Dingley rates made upon "just and fair lines" with a "substantial downward reduction":

[1] Via Philippines from other countries.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, we have concluded all our remarks on this side.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] such time as he desires.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I had prepared a little data, partly upon this bill and partly upon the general question of the tariff, which I will not submit at this time, but which I may desire later to print in the RECORD, and I may desire a longer time to put it in shape than was granted by the House. I therefore ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Illinois intend to print his remarks before Congress adjourns?

Mr. MANN. That will depend somewhat upon when Congress adjourns. I may never print them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suppose the gentleman has no intention of withholding them until after Congress adjourns?

Mr. MANN. Of course I can proceed with the speech, having the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and leave is granted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CULLOP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12812) to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all general debate on H. R. 12812, to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton, be now closed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that general debate on the bill H. R. 12812 be now closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, August 3, 1911, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. By Mr. SULZER: Resolution of Lake Grange, No. 362, of New York, favoring a parcels post; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, memorial of National Team Owners' Association, indorsing the Canadian reciprocity agreement; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, resolution of the Vincennes (Ind.) Branch of the Alliance of German Societies of the State of Indiana, approving House resolution No. 166; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, resolutions of the Workmen's Sick and Death Benefit Fund of the United States of America, condemning the manner of the arrest of the McNamaras and favoring the Berger resolution; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, resolution of the Central Labor Union of the District of Columbia, protesting against the proposed arbitration treaty with England; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, resolution of National Automobile Manufacturers' Association, favoring legislation so as to permit corporations and companies to make their returns as of the close of their fiscal years; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, August 3, 1911.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings when, on request of Mr. SMOOT, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PENROSE presented a memorial of the Union County Medical Society, of Lewisburg, Pa., remonstrating against the removal of Dr. Harvey W. Wiley as Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, Department of Agriculture, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles, Cal., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the so-called corporation-tax law permitting corporations to make returns at the end of their fiscal years, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

ROSEBUD INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. GAMBLE. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 3152) extending the time of payment to certain homesteaders in the Rosebud Indian Reservation in the State of South Dakota, and I submit a report (No. 115) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 12, before the word "payment," to strike out the word "such" and insert "and," and in line 14, after the word "manner," to insert "and on payment of interest annually in advance as aforesaid: Provided, That the last payment and all other payments must be made within a period not exceeding one year after the last payment is due; that all moneys paid for interest as herein provided shall be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the Indians as a part of the proceeds received for the lands," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who has heretofore made a homestead entry for land in what was formerly a part of the Rosebud Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, authorized by the act approved March 2, 1907, may apply to the register and receiver of the land office in the district in which the land is located for an extension of time within which to make payment of any amount that is about to become due, and upon the payment of interest for one year in advance, at 5 per cent per annum upon the amount due, and payment will be extended for a period of one year, and any payment so extended may annually thereafter be extended for a period of one year in the same manner, and on payment of interest annually in advance as aforesaid: Provided, That the last payment and all other payments must be made within a period not exceeding one year after the last payment is due, that all moneys paid for interest as herein provided shall be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the Indians as a part of the proceeds received for the lands.

SEC. 2. That failure to make any payment that may be due, unless the same be extended, or to make any extended payment at or before the time to which such payment has been extended as herein provided, will forfeit the entry and the same shall be canceled, and any and all payments theretofore made shall be forfeited.

SEC. 3. That nothing herein contained shall affect any valid adverse claim initiated prior to the passage of this act.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. KERN:

A bill (S. 3162) granting an increase of pension to Stephen Jarvis (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TAYLOR:

A bill (S. 3163) granting an increase of pension to Henry McMann (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 3164) for the relief of the heirs or estate of William Chambers, deceased (with accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 3165) for the relief of the heirs of James H. Robinson, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 3166) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to collect an annual rental for vault privileges granted in public space (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. OLIVER:

A bill (S. 3167) granting an increase of pension to William H. Hotham (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 3168) to appropriate the sum of $200,000 for the construction of a bridge across the Gila River, in Grant County, N. Mex.; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. OWEN:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 49) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to make a per capita payment to the enrolled members of the Five Civilized Tribes entitled to share in the funds of said tribes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—FRED C. AND C. HELEN FISHER.

On motion of Mr. WARREN, it was Ordered, That on the application of Fred C. and C. Helen Fisher they are authorized to withdraw from the files of the Senate all papers accompanying the bill (S. 2016, 62d Cong., 1st sess.) entitled "A bill for the relief of Fred C. and C. Helen Fisher," no adverse report having been made thereon.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate House bill 2983, in accordance with its unanimous-consent agreement heretofore entered into.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2983) for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Thirteenth Census.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Culberson	Lodge	Root
Bailey	Cullom	McLean	Shively
Bankhead	Cummins	Martin, Va.	Simmons
Borah	Curtis	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Md.
Bourne	Dillingham	Myers	Smith, Mich.
Bradley	Dixon	Nelson	Smoot
Brandegee	Fletcher	Newlands	Stephenson
Briggs	Foster	Nixon	Stone
Bristow	Gamble	O'Gorman	Swanson
Brown	Gronna	Oliver	Taylor
Bryan	Heyburn	Overman	Thornton
Burnham	Hitchcock	Owen	Townsend
Burton	Johnson, Me.	Page	Warren
Chilton	Johnston, Ala.	Penrose	Watson
Clapp	Jones	Perkins	Wetmore
Clark, Wyo.	Kenyon	Poindexter	Works
Clarke, Ark.	Kern	Pomerene
Crane	La Follette	Reed
Crawford	Lippitt	Richardson

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-three Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. Are there amendments to be offered to the bill?

Mr. BURTON. I desire to offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio offers the following amendment, which the Secretary will report.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, lines 15 and 16, strike out the words "by the legislature thereof in the manner herein prescribed," and insert in lieu thereof the words "in the manner provided by the laws thereof and in accordance with the rules enumerated in section 3 of this act," so that if amended the section will read:

SEC. 4. That in case of an increase in the number of Representatives in any State under this apportionment such additional Representative or Representatives shall be elected by the State at large and the other Representatives by the districts now prescribed by law until such State shall be redistricted in the manner provided by the laws thereof and in accordance with the rules enumerated in section 3 of this act, etc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Are we voting on both amendments at one time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is proposed as one amendment, striking out and inserting.

Mr. BACON. Very well. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. I vote "nay."

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when Mr. DAVIS's name was called). I was requested to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] is paired with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. It is a general pair; therefore I can not vote. If he were present, I would vote "yea."

Mr. BURNHAM (when Mr. GALLINGER's name was called). My colleague [Mr. GALLINGER] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea." I desire this statement to remain for the day.

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. GUGGENHEIM's name was called). I was requested to announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM] has a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER].

Mr. NELSON (when Mr. MCCUMBER's name was called). The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] is paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. If the Senator from North Dakota were present, he would vote "yea" on this question.

Mr. McLEAN (when his name was called). I desire to announce that I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I would vote "yea."

Mr. OLIVER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. If he were present, I would vote "yea."

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I am paired on this and all other votes to-day with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I will let this announcement stand for the remaining votes.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia (when Mr. PERCY's name was called). The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY] is paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. I desire that this statement may apply to all votes taken to-day.

Mr. RICHARDSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. If he were present, I would vote "yea."

Mr. SMOOT (when Mr. SUTHERLAND's name was called). My colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER].

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 39, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—39.

Borah	Clark, Wyo.	Heyburn	Poindexter
Bourne	Clarke, Ark.	Jones	Root
Bradley	Crane	Kenyon	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Crawford	La Follette	Smoot
Briggs	Cullom	Lippitt	Stephenson
Bristow	Cummins	Lodge	Townsend
Brown	Curtis	Nelson	Warren
Burnham	Dixon	Nixon	Wetmore
Burton	Gamble	Page	Works
Clapp	Gronna	Perkins

NAYS—28.

Bacon	Hitchcock	Newlands	Simmons
Bailey	Johnson, Me.	O'Gorman	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Johnston, Ala.	Overman	Stone
Bryan	Kern	Owen	Swanson
Chilton	Martin, Va.	Pomerene	Taylor
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Reed	Thornton
Foster	Myers	Shively	Watson

NOT VOTING—23.

Chamberlain	Gallinger	McLean	Richardson
Culberson	Gore	Oliver	Smith, S. C.
Davis	Guggenheim	Paynter	Sutherland
Dillingham	Lea	Penrose	Tillman
du Pont	Lorimer	Percy	Williams
Frye	McCumber	Rayner

So Mr. BURTON's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section 4 and in lieu of said section to insert:

SEC. 4. That in case of an increase in the number of Representatives in any State under this apportionment such additional Representative or Representatives shall be elected by the State at large and the other Representatives by the districts now prescribed by law until such State shall be redistricted by the legislature thereof, or by the people thereof, in the manner herein prescribed; and if there be no change in the number of Representatives from a State, the Representatives thereof shall be elected from the districts now prescribed by law until such State shall be redistricted as herein prescribed.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his question of order.

Mr. LODGE. Is the amendment which has been read offered to replace the amendment just adopted by striking out and inserting?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is offered as a substitute for the entire section—for the amendment and the remainder of the section.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I make the point of order on that amendment, because the insertion of the words "by the people" would be the exact equivalent of an amendment to the amendment just adopted, and it is out of order; in other words, it practically restores the words just stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that in the way in which the amendment is presented it is proper to receive it. In the one case the Senate acted upon the words "by the legislature thereof," and in the case presented by the Senator from Missouri the Senate is asked to pass upon the insertion of the words "or by the people thereof," which are additional words. The question is on agreeing to the substitute. [Putting the question.] The "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BURTON. I ask unanimous consent that the portion of the section affected by this amendment be again read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. The original text of section 4 reads:

That in case of an increase in the number of Representatives in any State under this apportionment such additional Representative or Representatives shall be elected by the State at large and the other Representatives by the districts now prescribed by law until such State shall be redistricted by the legislature thereof.

The only new words which appear in the amended section are after the words "legislature thereof," the words inserted being "or by the people thereof."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is the substitute offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] for the section a substitute for the section as amended on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; certainly.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). I again announce the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). In view of my general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], I withhold my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I again announce my general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], and withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. OLIVER (when his name was called). I again announce my general pair with the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. I make this announcement to stand for the day on all succeeding votes.

Mr. RICHARDSON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 29, nays 38, as follows:

YEAS—29.

Bacon	Hitchcock	O'Gorman	Stone
Bankhead	Johnson, Me.	Overman	Swanson
Bourne	Johnston, Ala.	Owen	Taylor
Bryan	Kern	Pomerene	Thornton
Chilton	Martin, Va.	Reed	Watson
Clarke, Ark.	Martine, N. J.	Shively
Fletcher	Myers	Simmons
Foster	Newlands	Smith, Md.

NAYS—38.

Borah	Crane	Kenyon	Root
Bradley	Crawford	La Follette	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Cullom	Lippitt	Smoot
Briggs	Cummins	Lodge	Stephenson
Bristow	Curtis	Lorimer	Townsend
Brown	Dixon	Nelson	Warren
Burnham	Gamble	Nixon	Wetmore
Burton	Gronna	Page	Works
Clapp	Heyburn	Perkins
Clark, Wyo.	Jones	Poindexter

NOT VOTING—23.

Bailey	Frye	McLean	Richardson
Chamberlain	Gallinger	Oliver	Smith, S. C.
Culberson	Gore	Paynter	Sutherland
Davis	Guggenheim	Penrose	Tillman
Dillingham	Lea	Percy	Williams
du Pont	McCumber	Rayner

So Mr. REED's amendment was rejected.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I have another amendment which I desire to offer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add the following as a new section:

SEC. 5. That candidates for Representative or Representatives to be elected at large in any State shall be nominated in the same manner as candidates for governor, unless otherwise provided by the laws of such State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "ayes" have it, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Did I understand the Chair to declare that the amendment was carried?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so declared.

Mr. ROOT. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out from and including line 5, on page 1, down to and including line 15, on page 3, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

Three hundred and ninety-one Members to be apportioned among the several States as follows:

Alabama, 9; Arkansas, 7; California, 10; Colorado, 3; Connecticut, 5; Delaware, 1; Florida, 3; Georgia, 11; Idaho, 1; Illinois, 24; Indiana, 12; Iowa, 10; Kansas, 7; Kentucky, 10; Louisiana, 7; Maine, 3; Maryland, 6; Massachusetts, 14; Michigan, 12; Minnesota, 9; Mississippi, 8; Missouri, 14; Montana, 2; Nebraska, 5; Nevada, 1; New Hampshire, 2; New Jersey, 11; New York, 39; North Carolina, 9; North Dakota, 2; Ohio, 20; Oklahoma, 7; Oregon, 3; Pennsylvania, 33; Rhode Island, 2; South Carolina, 7; South Dakota, 2; Tennessee, 9; Texas, 17; Utah, 2; Vermont, 2; Virginia, 9; Washington, 5; West Virginia, 5; Wisconsin, 10; Wyoming, 1.

Mr. SHIVELY. On that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). Again announcing the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], I vote "nay."

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I again announce that in the absence of my pair, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], I withhold my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). As I have already announced, I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. I am informed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] that if the Senator from South Carolina were present he would vote against this amendment. I am therefore released, as I shall vote the same way. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to state that the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] is paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. If the Senator from North Dakota were present, he would, on this amendment, vote "nay."

Mr. CULBERSON. I transfer my pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], and vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 46, as follows:

YEAS—23.

Bourne	Clark, Wyo.	La Follette	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Clarke, Ark.	Lodge	Smoot
Briggs	Crane	Nelson	Townsend
Bristow	Dixon	Nixon	Warren
Burnham	Jones	Poindexter	Works
Burton	Kenyon	Root

NAYS—46.

Bacon	Curtis	Lorimer	Shively
Bailey	Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Simmons
Bankhead	Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Md.
Borah	Foster	Myers	Stephenson
Bradley	Gamble	Newlands	Stone
Brown	Gronna	O'Gorman	Swanson
Bryan	Heyburn	Overman	Taylor
Chilton	Hitchcock	Owen	Thornton
Clapp	Johnson, Me.	Page	Watson
Culberson	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Wetmore
Cullom	Kern	Pomerene
Cummins	Lippitt	Reed

NOT VOTING—21.

Chamberlain	Gore	Paynter	Sutherland
Crawford	Guggenheim	Penrose	Tillman
Davis	Lea	Percy	Williams
du Pont	McCumber	Rayner
Frye	McLean	Richardson
Gallinger	Oliver	Smith, S. C.

So Mr. ROOT's amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRONNA. At the requst of my colleague [Mr. MCCUMBER] I present the following amendment. He is necessarily absent from the city. In connection with it I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a short statement made by him. It contains only about a dozen lines.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. LODGE. Does that conform to the unanimous-consent agreement?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would require unanimous consent. The Chair was in doubt even whether it ought to be put for unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. I do not see how we can modify a unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts objects, anyway.

Mr. PENROSE. The statement can be inserted in the RECORD after this matter is disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Afterwards; certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. That was my request.

Mr. LODGE (to Mr. GRONNA). Make the request after the bill is disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can make the request after the matter is disposed of, not now.

The Senator from North Dakota, on behalf of his colleague [Mr. MCCUMBER], offers an amendment, which the Secretary will report.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section 1 after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That after the 3d day of March——

The VICE PRESIDENT. One moment. The Chair thinks that is not in order at the present time. There has been one motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. GRONNA. This amendment was offered in the Senate by my colleague on the 18th day of July. It was ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands this is a different proposition. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section 1 after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That after the 3d day of March, 1913, the House of Representatives shall be composed of 405 Members, to be apportioned among the several States as follows:

Alabama, 9; Arkansas, 7; California, 10; Colorado, 4; Connecticut, 5; Delaware, 1; Florida, 3; Georgia, 11; Idaho, 1; Illinois, 25; Indiana, 12; Iowa, 10; Kansas, 7; Kentucky, 10; Louisiana, 7; Maine, 3; Maryland, 6; Massachusetts, 15; Michigan, 12; Minnesota, 9; Mississippi, 8; Missouri, 15; Montana, 2; Nebraska, 5; Nevada, 1; New Hampshire, 2; New Jersey, 11; New York, 40; North Carolina, 10; North Dakota, 3; Ohio, 21; Oklahoma, 7; Oregon, 3; Pennsylvania, 34; Rhode Island, 2; South Carolina, 7; South Dakota, 3; Tennessee, 10; Texas, 17; Utah, 2; Vermont, 2; Virginia, 9; Washington, 5; West Virginia, 5; Wisconsin, 10; Wyoming, 1.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota in behalf of his colleague.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to suggest a point of order. We have already voted upon a motion to strike out and insert these items with the exception probably of half a dozen. I do not understand, under the rules, that those States that were included in the former motion to strike out and insert can be again——

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was the Chair's notion at the first reading, and it is the Chair's notion now that it can not be offered at this stage of the proceeding. The Chair sustains the point of order raised by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. We have voted on that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there other amendments? If not, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. GRONNA. On behalf of my colleague I offer the amendment which I sent to the desk a few moments ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota, on behalf of his colleague, offers the amendment which has just been read. If there be no objection, the amendment will not be read again.

The question first is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROOT. May there be read the first three lines of the amendment, which will state the present number?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read again.

The SECRETARY. In section 1 strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That after the 3d day of March, 1913, the House of Representatives shall be composed of 405 Members.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota on behalf of his colleague.

Mr. REED. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri will state it.

Mr. REED. Is not this the amendment which was just ruled out of order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the Committee of the Whole. The bill is now in the Senate.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes appear to have it.

Mr. ROOT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). Again announcing the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], I vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). On this question I am released from my general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. GORE] with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN].

Mr. CULBERSON. I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], and will vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 47, as follows:

YEAS—22.

Brandegee	Crawford	Lodge	Smoot

So Mr. MCCUMBER's amendment was rejected.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The statement prepared by Mr. MCCUMBER and presented by Mr. GRONNA, with respect to the amendment offered by Mr. GRONNA on behalf of Mr. MCCUMBER, is as follows:

Under this amendment 9 States would lose 1 Member each from their present apportionment. These States are Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Maine, Missouri, Nebraska, Virginia, and Wisconsin, and 10 States would gain 1 Representative each, namely, Colorado, Georgia, Massachusetts, Montana, New Jersey, North Dakota, Oregon, South Dakota, Texas, and Utah; 4 States would gain 2 Representatives, namely, California, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, and Washington, while the State of New York would gain 3.

This would increase the membership of the House 12 Members, until such time as Arizona or New Mexico would be admitted, and in that event the membership would be increased 2 more, 1 for each of those States.

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 14) to admit the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona as States into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I move to make the joint resolution the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That can not be done now; it is the unfinished business at 2 o'clock.

IRRIGATION DISTRICTS UNDER TERRITORIAL LAWS.

Mr. BRISTOW. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 2541) to amend an act entitled "An act to prohibit the passage of local or special laws in the Territories of the United States, to limit Territorial indebtedness, and for other purposes."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I rise for information. I would inquire what disposition was made of the motion of the Senator from Michigan to proceed to the consideration of the statehood resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That motion prevailed. Pending further action upon the joint resolution, the Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which is about to be read. The Senator from Michigan moved that the joint resolution which had been taken up be made the unfinished business, but the Chair did not entertain the motion because it was not in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. My difficulty was that I did not hear the Secretary read the joint resolution that was taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is now under consideration, and the Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 2541, which will be read.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to amend section 4 of the act entitled "An act to prohibit the passage of local or special laws in the Territories of the United States, to limit Territorial indebtedness, and for other purposes," approved July 30, 1886, by adding to that section the following proviso:

Provided, That the prohibitions and limitations contained in this section shall not be construed to apply to irrigation districts heretofore or hereafter organized in accordance with Territorial laws.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BACON. It is whether or not the bill has the approval of the Committee on Territories.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was reported by the Committee on Territories.

Mr. BACON. With a recommendation for its passage?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was favorably reported.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HEYBURN in the chair). The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 14) to admit the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona as States into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I understand that the joint resolution will come up at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is now before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask that the joint resolution be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan asks that the pending business be temporarily laid aside. Is there unanimous consent? The Chair hears no objection, and the pending business is laid aside.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask unanimous consent that Senate resolution 109 be taken up for consideration.

Mr. BURTON. May I ask what the number is on the calendar?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The calendar number is 94. It is the resolution relating to a legislative program. It has already been considered in part and amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 109?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada if he calls up the resolution for the purpose of speaking upon it or for the purpose of having a vote upon it to-day?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I call it up for the purpose of having a vote.

Mr. SMOOT. There are a number of Senators away at this time who are interested in this matter. I shall object to its consideration. I ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move that Senate resolution 109 be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada moves that, notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from Utah, the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution No. 109.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It requires no motion. The Senate will proceed to the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII.

The bill (S. 25) to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, pawnbrokers, and real estate brokers in the District of Columbia was announced as first in order on the calendar.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). The bill will go over under the objection of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill, the objection of the Senator from Idaho to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Clark, Wyo.	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Clarke, Ark.	O'Gorman	Smith, Mich.
Borah	Crane	Overman	Smoot
Bourne	Curtis	Page	Stephenson
Bradley	Gronna	Penrose	Swanson
Brandegee	Heyburn	Perkins	Taylor
Briggs	Hitchcock	Poindexter	Thornton
Bristow	Johnson, Me.	Pomerene	Townsend
Brown	Jones	Reed	Warren
Burnham	Kern	Root	Watson
Burton	Lodge	Shively	Wetmore
Chilton	Martin, Va.	Simmons

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. SMOOT obtained the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to ask unanimous consent to call up from the table Senate bill 2846, for the improvement of rural-delivery roads, and have it referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from North Carolina that the pending question is upon the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 25, the first bill on the calendar, and pending that motion the absence of a quorum was suggested by the Senator from Idaho. A quorum having been developed, the Chair considers himself obliged to place the motion of the Senator from Kansas before the Senate, and it is not debatable.

Mr. BACON. I understand——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BACON. I understand that a motion to take up is not debatable. A parliamentary inquiry, however, I think, is in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. BACON. It is this: The Senate is now under a unanimous-consent agreement with reference to the joint resolution which is now the unfinished business, and to displace it would undoubtedly be a violation of that unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business under the unanimous-consent agreement will not come before the Senate until the hour of 2 o'clock, in the opinion of the Chair, and pending the time before that hour the Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the first order of business on the calendar.

Mr. BACON. Then I make the parliamentary inquiry, whether, in the opinion of the Chair, the motion relates only to business being in order until 2 o'clock?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Only until then.

Mr. BACON. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. When the hour of 2 o'clock arrives the Chair will lay before the Senate House joint resolution 14 as the unfinished business, whether the motion of the Senator from Kansas is carried or not. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas. [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Chair the ayes have it.

Mr. REED. I ask for a roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask for information upon what the vote is to be taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon the motion of the Senator from Kansas that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 25, the first bill on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. If the motion prevails, it will not displace the statehood resolution, which has been temporarily laid aside?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands, the statehood resolution being the unfinished business, it will be laid before the Senate at 2 o'clock, and before that time it is competent for the Senate to consider any other measure.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HEYBURN. I wish the Senator from Pennsylvania would withhold the motion.

Mr. PENROSE. Very well; I withhold the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania withholds the motion.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not want to discuss a motion to adjourn, but I desire to make a statement before a motion to adjourn is put, a motion to adjourn not being debatable. There is pending a demand for the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair overruled the demand because there was not a second to the call.

Mr. HEYBURN. Very well; then there is nothing pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is pending, and pending that the Senator from Pennsylvania moved that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HEYBURN. That motion not being debatable, I sincerely hope that no motion to adjourn will be pressed, because notice has been given by Senators who desire to speak upon the statehood resolution which will occupy all of Monday, and more, too. There remain only to-day and to-morrow and Saturday to discuss the statehood resolution.

Some Senators may be better advised than I in regard to the situation of the joint resolution before this body. I desire to see developed something that will enable us to form a more accurate and better judgment as to the kind of support or opposition that is to be given to that measure. I deem it as very important. I am not at all inclined to allow it to go by default, so far as I am concerned. If we were going to take up another matter that would occupy the Senate until 2 o'clock—and I am speaking now by unanimous consent—then at 2 o'clock we would know very well what to do; but in the meantime I think the Senate should continue in session until 2 o'clock in order that we may have as a basis of our action the status of the existing unfinished business.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to state that the colloquy or running debate at present is proceeding by unanimous consent. There is a motion pending before the Senate which is not debatable. Does the Senator from Michigan rise to a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not.

Mr. HEYBURN. I asked for unanimous consent, and I received it.

Mr. REED. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will state it.

Mr. REED. Is the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] still before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is, and it is the only motion before the Senate.

Mr. REED. Has a motion been made to adjourn?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion to adjourn was made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]; it then was withheld, and is now held in abeyance.

Mr. REED. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Clark, Wyo.	Martine, N. J.	Root
Bankhead	Crane	Nelson	Simmons
Bourne	Crawford	O'Gorman	Smith, Mich.
Bradley	Curtis	Oliver	Smoot
Brandegee	Gamble	Owen	Stephenson
Briggs	Heyburn	Page	Taylor
Bristow	Johnson, Me.	Penrose	Thornton
Brown	Jones	Perkins	Warren
Burnham	La Follette	Poindexter	Watson
Burton	Lodge	Pomerene	Wetmore
Chilton	Martin, Va.	Reed

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is not present.

Mr. PENROSE. I renew my motion that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, August 4, 1911, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, August 3, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven help us to live strong, pure, noble, brave, generous-hearted Christian lives in all the complicated relationships of this existence. We pray, Our Father, and then forget that we are brothers, and sometimes the strong oppress the weak, the rich grind the poor, the ambitious traduces and smirches the character of a brother to blast his reputation. Forgive us, Oh we beseech Thee, for that; we pray hallowed be Thy name, and then take that holy name in profanity upon our lips. Forgive us, we beseech Thee, for that. We pray let Thy kingdom come and Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven, then go about sowing the seeds of discord. Forgive us, we beseech Thee, for that. Help us to pray gold and live golden lives; to pray righteously and live righteous lives, after the similitude of the world's great exemplar. Amen.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BELL of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy-nine Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER directed the doors to be closed and the Clerk to call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Anderson, Ohio	Gillett	Langley	Pujo
Andrus	Glass	Latta	Rainey
Barchfeld	Goodwin, Ark.	Legare	Ransdell, La.
Bartlett	Gordon	Lever	Riordan

Fordney	Konig	Plumley	White
Fornes	Konop	Porter	Wilson, Pa.
Francis	Lamb	Powers	Young, Mich.
Gardner, Mass.	Langham	Prince	Young, Tex.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CLAYTON). The call discloses the fact that there are 282 Members present, a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were reopened.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, there are a number of bills on the calendar put there by unanimous consent, all with the approval of the Committee on the District of Columbia. I therefore ask unanimous consent that next Saturday be set apart for their consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks that next Saturday be set aside for the consideration of District of Columbia bills. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky when the next District day comes regularly?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Next Monday week.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me that there is plenty of time to pass on the bills.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There is plenty of time if Congress does not adjourn before then. It is that possibility that I wish to anticipate.

Mr. MANN. If there is any prospect of Congress adjourning before then, we will learn it in due time. I think at present I shall have to object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following applications for leave of absence:

Mr. HARDY, indefinitely, on account of illness.

Mr. GUERNSEY, indefinitely, on account of death in his family.

Mr. REDFIELD, for two weeks, commencing the 4th instant, because of business of an imperative nature.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to these requests?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object to the requests for leave of absence on account of illness or death in family, but to all others I shall for the present object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects to the leave of absence for the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] on account of business, but does not object to those that are asked on account of sickness, and it will be so ordered.

THE COTTON SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12812) to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12812) to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton, with Mr. CULLOP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House, general debate is closed. The bill will now be considered under the five-minute rule, and the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the 1st day of January, 1912, the articles hereinafter enumerated, described, and provided for shall, when imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), be subject to the payment of duties at the rates hereinafter provided; that is to say:

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I shall offer no other amendment to this bill, not because I do not think the bill could be improved, for perhaps the most substantial improvement that could be made to it would be a motion to strike out the enacting clause. I could suggest other amendments that would improve it all along the line; but, Mr. Chairman, what is the use? In the first place, we have an eminent statistician at work upon the cotton schedule. He happens to represent the Tariff Reform League of the city of New York. He is Mr. Parsons, of that league. That tariff-reform league is a free-trade institution, and it always has been, headed by our old friend John De Witt Warner, who used to be a Member of the House and who proclaimed free trade here when it was not quite so popular among the Democracy as it is at the present time.

I do not believe that my genial friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], if he were a free moral agent here, would allow any amendments to this bill unless he got statistics from Mr. Parsons which would justify the amendment in the opinion of the gentleman from Alabama and also the gentleman from New York, Mr. Parsons. But, Mr. Chairman, even though I got the consent of the gentleman from Alabama, still the bill could not be amended, because there are some two hundred and odd gentlemen on the other side who have become slaves to the caucus of the Democratic Party, and they vote whichever way the majority of that party say. They have adopted this bill without amendment from beginning to end and without consideration of amendment to the bill. They did it on a one-sided hearing. They had the information for the purpose of defending the bill contained in the print of the bill that was laid before the caucus, and it does not appear that they had any other information on the subject. They spent some of their time in deliberating whether they would take up the cotton schedule or the iron schedule, but that does not seem to have taken much time, because the iron schedule was brushed aside at an early stage of the proceedings, against the protest of my genial friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. They have agreed on this bill, and what is the use of spending your breath offering an amendment to it. Why, they had the wool bill here under the same conditions. They had a free-list bill under the same conditions. We offered amendments on this side. Most of the sensible men on that side were convinced that the amendments, many of them, ought to be adopted in order to make the bill intelligible, let alone improving it as a revenue measure, but they did not dare to vote for them. Those amendments were voted down by a solid vote, because the caucus, without information on this subject and without a suggestion from any gentleman in the caucus as to the improvement of the bill, had voted that it should pass as it passed the caucus.

Mr. Chairman, all of this matter will get before the country in due time. The people will understand the methods of you gentlemen on that side. You will not be able to cry "czarism" and shake your fingers at us. That issue is played out. Even the muckrake magazines can not raise it against us. They may take hold of it and expose you. What a nice bit of sensational business that would be—just to give the facts in regard to your action in caucus and your action on great tariff bills.

What matter if these cotton schedules affect the production of over $800,000,000 worth of goods and over a half a million laborers employed in that industry? What difference does it make? You have given your conscience over to the keeping of the Democratic end of the Committee on Ways and Means——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield——

Mr. PAYNE (continuing). And they have given theirs over to the chairman of the committee, and whether the gentleman from New York, Mr. Parsons, has the keeping of the chairman's conscience, I am not able to inform you.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to his colleague?

Mr. PAYNE. Why, certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman prepared a tariff bill——

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). Which was passed, and under the rule which was adopted not only could no amendment be offered in the House, but the gentleman did not even submit his bill to a Republican caucus. What is he complaining about now?

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman is acting apparently on misinformation——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no.

Mr. PAYNE (continuing). He was present here and he ought to know better.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for an additional five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Amendments were offered to what?

Mr. PAYNE. The House adopted a rule by which the committee amendments were given the preference, but individuals did offer amendments to that bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. To what part of that bill?

Mr. PAYNE. The barley schedule, for instance, and I could name others.

Mr. KENDALL. The lumber schedule also.

Mr. PAYNE. And oil.

Mr. KENDALL. And hides.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know the number of things, but they are so numerous I can not enumerate them in the five minutes I have.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. PAYNE. I do.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. May I suggest to the gentleman that the Republican Party is not in the habit of legislating by caucus?

Mr. PAYNE. Of course the House did it. I supposed my friend from New York understood that and it was not necessary to mention it. The House passed upon these amendments and nobody was bound to vote either way. Gentlemen on this side did not follow me on all of them and they voted as they pleased, some with the Democratic Party, and they were privileged to do so. We did not ask them to go into a Republican caucus and bind themselves in advance. But it is different over there. You have created a body unknown to the Constitution, unknown to legislation in regard to a tariff bill, to pass upon these bills affecting the great interests of this country, a caucus, a one-sided affair. Nobody but the gentleman from Alabama occupied the floor for the most part, and according to what we got out of it he was all over the floor pretty much all the time. The people representing the southern cotton mills sat here speechless. Your constituents wanted to be heard before the committee, and they plead with the chairman for a hearing in regard to their business. Oh, no; he was turned down; he was turned down—the southern cotton-mill representative. One of these days he will turn about and do something on his own hook, because he had a right to be heard. [Applause on the Republican side.] They will demand their right to be heard of the American people, and they will put a party in here that will hear the people. What are you passing this bill for; do you expect it to become a law? You are trying to put the President in a hole, are you? Why, Mr. Chairman, if you sent bills there from now until the 1st day of December it will not be a marker in the direction of putting the President in a hole.

That gentleman, statesman, man of brains, and man of character has certain settled convictions, and one of them is in favor of a Tariff Board for collecting evidence and using it in the making up of schedules. Do you suppose it is going to embarrass him to send these crude, ill-examined, uninformed bills to him for a veto? Why, he has the greatest opportunity that a President has had in years to stand up to the convictions which he has so long espoused, and veto these bills one after another, until you have considered the information which my dear friend from Alabama so much wanted when the question of a Tariff Board was up for discussion in the House less than six months ago. Oh, how he pleaded with you with tears in his eyes! If it is necessary in making a protective tariff, how much more necessary will it be when we come to make a tariff for revenue only? [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has again expired.

Mr. PAYNE. I will not trespass further now. I will try and strike out another word at some other time, Mr. Chairman.

However, under the leave to print I will add now a letter printed in the New York Sun of August 3, 1911, as follows:

THE COTTON INDUSTRY.

WASHINGTON, August 2.

A preliminary statement issued by the Bureau of the Census shows the product value of the cotton manufactures of the country in 1909 as $828,270,364, including cloth, small wares, hosiery, and knit goods. The capital represented by these industries is $983,963,497, and the average number of wage earners exceeds 500,000. The cost of the materials used in that year was $477,496,880, and the pay rolls, not including salaried officials and the clerical force, amounted to $171,109,253. The payments to officials and clerks are not reported in the statement, but from reports of earlier years it may be assumed that they were not far from $15,000,000.

The output value being $828,000,000 and payments for materials, wages, and salaries amounting to approximately $663,000,000, to which may be added 7 per cent of output value, or about $60,000,000 for rent, taxes, insurance, interest, and other sundry expenses, approximately $100,000,000 is left to cover the cost of selling, packing, distribution, business losses, and all else, including profits. It is evident that the net profits of the industry as a whole are not and can not be more than 7 or 8 per cent at the most on either the cost of the merchandise or the capital actually invested. The fallacy of enormous profits in the industry, because there are mills that pay from 20 to 40 per cent dividends on a capitalization that represents only a quarter or a half of the actual investment or physical valuation, has been fully shown. A badly managed mill is almost certain to fail, and a well-conducted enterprise makes no more than a reasonable profit.

The division of the total output value of the industry is:

Cotton goods	$616,524,665
Small wares	13,174,111
Hosiery and knit goods	198,571,568

The development of the industry can not be shown on a basis of output value, for the reason that in the census year 1899 the average price of raw cotton was 6.88 cents a pound, while in 1909 the price averaged 12.68 cents. Measured in terms of raw cotton used in American mills and factories, it appears that there was a gain of about 25 per cent. Measured in yards, there was an increase of 54 per cent in the production of plain cloths for printing or converting, of 8 per cent in brown or bleached sheetings and shirtings, of 93 per cent in ginghams, of 80 per cent in fancy woven fabrics; of 148 per cent in corduroy, cotton velvet, and plush; of 126 per cent in lace and lace curtains; of 22 per cent in cotton twine; and gains large or small in other lines. Measured by capital, the industry nearly doubled, the increase having been:

	Cotton goods.	Small wares.	Hosiery and knit goods.
1909	808,287,933	12,820,772	162,854,787

These various evidences of the growth of the industry demonstrate the increase in domestic consumption and in the purchasing power of the people. Broadly viewed, there appears to have been an increase of perhaps a little more than 25 per cent in production, measured in quantity, but there was an increase of nearly 100 per cent in output value, due principally to much higher cost of raw material and in part to increased wages to employees. The present high cost of cotton goods is attributable far more to the high cost of raw cotton than to the influences of the tariff. The growth of the industry in the different sections of the country is interesting. While there has been a particularly notable expansion in the South, the older centers of manufacture have not been standing still.

The increase is measurable in consumption of raw cotton and in the number of active spindles. In 1900 the mills of the cotton-growing States operating 4,367,688 spindles, used 1,523,168 bales of cotton; in 1910, with 10,801,494 spindles, they used 2,292,333 bales. The mills of New England, with 13,171,377 spindles, in 1900 used 1,909,498 bales of raw cotton, and in 1910, with 16,112,496 spindles, used 2,016,386 bales. The fact that the cotton-growing States used more cotton than was used in New England is explained by the transfer to the South of a very large part of the trade in coarse and heavy goods, while the New England mills have given their attention mainly to the finer weaves, requiring more and better labor and less raw material. In a 500-pound bale of cotton there may be 2,000 yards or less of a coarse and heavy cloth or 10,000 yards or more of fine fabric. The figures for 1909 are not yet at hand, but the point may be illustrated by the figures for 1905. In that year these products are reported for the respective sections in yards:

	New England.	Southern States.
Brown or bleached shirtings and sheetings	373,000,000	737,000,000
Duck	23,000,000	81,000,000
Drills	30,000,000	164,000,000
Ticks, denims, and stripes	109,000,000	139,000,000
Yarns for sale (pounds)	113,000,000	204,000,000

These products represent quantity of raw material rather than quality of product. How much can be shaved from the present tariff on cotton goods without serious danger to the mills, northern or southern, remains to be seen. At least it does not appear, as far as the mills are concerned, that the profits of the industry are criminally swollen by Schedule I.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, just a word in opposition to the gentleman. The gentleman from New York states that this side of the House legislates by caucus. It legislates with a unanimous party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There is no way that I know of that the party's position can be ascertained until they meet in caucus. On the other hand, I say it is to the discredit of the gentlemen on that side of the House that when the Payne bill came before the last Congress the Republican Party desired to present it to this House under a rule that would prevent any amendment being offered, and it was only by the coercion of the gentleman then from Minnesota, Mr. Tawney, and other Members on that side of the House, that your party was forced to bring in a rule that allowed 5 amendments. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It allowed the House to consider 5 items in the bill carrying, as I believe was estimated, in the neighborhood of 4,000 items. You allowed the House to vote on 5 propositions, and then ordered it to swallow the bill as a whole or none. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

That is the difference between the two parties. There is not a man on this side of the House that is bound against his conscience or is bound against the will of his constituency, even if it requires a two-thirds vote in the Democratic caucus to make a proposition binding as a party measure, but has a right to exempt himself from that caucus rule, and that right has been availed of a number of times since these matters have been brought before the House. So that to come here and claim that we are shackled is to try and make the country believe a statement that the real facts do not justify.

Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] himself knows, and every man on that side of the House knows, that with the various bills we have considered here men have arisen in the caucus and said that a bill was not in accord with their promises to their constituents or their consciences, exempted themselves from the caucus rule and voted as they pleased, without any criticism from anyone on this side of the House. The difference is that we bring a bill before this House—the only time in the history of this House for many years and never in the history of the Republican Party—and throw it wide open. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We allow any man on that side of the House to offer his amendment, make his argument, and present his case to the American people. But when the Payne bill was under consideration we were not only not allowed to offer any amendments, but we could not speak in the Committee of the Whole except to the five amendments that you permitted because the other amendments were not germane to the bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Debate on this amendment under the rule has closed, and without objection the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] will be withdrawn. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] taunts this side of the House because of its division. Yesterday we witnessed a remarkable scene in this House in the tribute which was paid to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] by the Democratic side of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In the last 30 years we have had three different persons as candidates of the Democratic Party for President. I remember hearing the gentleman who occupies the Speaker's chair in this House say on the floor of this House that the greatest calamity that had befallen the human race since the crucifixion of Christ was the second election of the Democratic candidate, Grover Cleveland, as President of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.] And yesterday we witnessed the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] in parliamentary language calling the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. Bryan, a liar. The man who was candidate for President three times on the Democratic ticket could not be honored by a single gentleman on the Democratic side rising to defend him. [Applause on the Republican side.] And yet they throw stones at us for the divisions in our ranks, forgetting that all of their house is thin glass.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] yesterday stated that the iron and steel schedule was not considered first by the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee despite his request or suggestion to the contrary, and we might be led to assume from the modesty of the statement of the gentleman from Alabama that he was least of all on the Democratic side. Why, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama, OSCAR UNDERWOOD, is not only the leader of the Democratic majority in the House, but he is the Democratic majority. [Applause and laughter.] He is not only the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, but he is the Ways and Means Committee. [Laughter and applause.]

In the old days they used to honor the Speaker of the House as being the Grand Chief Mogul, the man of power. The Speaker of the House to-day is the servant, not the master, of the gentleman from Alabama. [Laughter on the Republican side.] And when our friend from Alabama describes how he was overridden by the Democratic members of his committee he is too modest. He is "It," in the language of to-day, and I can foresee, conceding some divisions on our side, the beautiful harmony that will exist among the Democrats of the country, with OSCAR UNDERWOOD on one side and the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. Bryan, on the other, pulling hair and calling each other liars. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to discuss to any extent the pending bill, but I make it a rule each day to find at least some one funny thing at which I may enjoy laughter, and I have seldom read a funnier joke than is a part of the report upon this bill. The gentleman from Alabama, aided by the great statistician he is permitted to employ, undertakes on page 46 of his report to figure out the extra cost to the American people by reason of the tariff upon cotton goods.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. REDFIELD. I object.

Mr. FITZGERALD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is recognized.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the versatility of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was never better exemplified than to-day. The gentleman from New York started out to complain that it was futile to offer amendments to this bill. No one would expect the gentleman from New York to expect that anybody would adopt the amendments he might propose to tariff bills in this session of Congress after the way in which the people in the last election treated the bill that bears his name. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

From the standpoint of practical results, of course, it is futile for the gentleman from New York to offer amendments to this bill, because his ideas upon tariff legislation have been repudiated by the people of the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In the first session of the Sixty-first Congress, in which the Payne tariff bill was considered in this House, a special rule was adopted for the consideration of the bill, which provided that the bill, immediately after the adoption of the rule on the 5th of April, should be considered under the five-minute rule, but that committee amendments to any part of the bill should have preference, and that amendments should be permitted to be offered only to paragraphs 196, 197, 708, 581, 447½, 227, and 228; also an amendment to paragraph 647, and to insert a new paragraph, No. 36½. There were 718 paragraphs in the first section of the Payne bill, and there were 42 sections in all; and the House was given the privilege of offering amendments to only 9 paragraphs out of 718 in the bill. On the 9th of April the previous question was to be considered as ordered on the bill and all pending amendments, and during the entire four days not a single line of the bill was read excepting amendments offered by the committee under the rule and amendments offered to the particular paragraphs enumerated.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] supported that rule. Let me suggest the manner in which it was prepared. There was no caucus of the Republican Party to consider the manner in which that bill should be considered in the House, but "gum-shoe methods" were adopted, and a member of the majority went about from delegation to delegation to find out just how little must be yielded in order to get a majority to support the rule.

Let me read what one gentleman said about it.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, as much as I dislike the wording of this rule, I am going to vote for it. I want to say to the gentlemen on this side of the House who have been for several days demanding that certain provisions should be put into this rule before they would vote for it—I say to you, gentlemen, some of you from the States of Minnesota, and Iowa, and from Kansas, that you are not good Republicans. [Laughter.] You are not good protectionists. [Applause.] You are demanding protection for an industry directly in your representative district, and demanding free trade on the products of another State, your neighbor.

Not good Republicans because these gentlemen insisted upon an opportunity to offer and vote upon some amendments to that infamous tariff law.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] spoke on this rule, and what did he say?

Gentlemen, there has never been a moment since I have had a seat in this House that I did not believe that the wisdom of a majority of the Republican Party, after full consideration of a question, was better than my own, and I was willing to follow, no matter who led the great mass of Republicans and blazed the way. [Applause on the Republican side.]

So, gentlemen, we should surrender our individual opinions, we should surrender for the good of our party, we should surrender for the good of the country. This is the way all great measures are passed in the House of Representatives, and with the Democratic Party carping and criticising and ready to do mischief in any way they can. There are a few dissatisfied gentlemen on this side, but I want them to stop and think how many industries they might destroy for want of proper knowledge and information. How many industries might you destroy not only in the whole country, but even in your own congressional district?

We had our full consideration in a caucus; you had yours in the hallways and the corridors of the Capitol, where nobody could speak in the open. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman desire more time? If so, I hope he may have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not like to intrude on the courtesy of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to express my gratitude to the House.

Why should the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] complain because the Democrats in the House are willing to adopt his theory of party management and to hold caucuses, and to thrash out whatever differences they may have upon legislation, and after a full and free conference have the minority of our party acquiesce in the will of the majority? That is the Democratic doctrine, and although it seems to be the only Democratic theory ever adopted by my colleague from New York [Mr. PAYNE], I am sure that we desire to congratulate him that he should feel that sense of party responsibility.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] in that same speech pointed out that responsibility for tariff legislation was upon that side of the House in the last Congress, and that it would accept the responsibility and abide by the result after the people had an opportunity to pass upon it. The people have had that opportunity. The result has not been as satisfactory as the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] would have preferred, and it ill becomes him in a "carping spirit," to use an expression of his own, to criticize this side of the House for assuming responsibility and inviting the judgment of the people upon their action. If the gentleman from New York believes that the paragraph just read, or any other paragraph in this bill, is not the best from the standpoint either of his own peculiar tariff views or of any other gentleman, let him submit his amendment. If it be good, I am sure it will receive at least the united support of that side of the House in this Congress, although it did not even receive such support in the last Congress. It could not be expected that this side of the House would now acquiesce in the leadership of my colleague from New York [Mr. PAYNE] on tariff matters, because we came here commissioned by the people to follow a different leadership in tariff matters, and not to accept the views of my colleague [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman is afraid that his side of the House will not vote for any amendment I offer, why, under the name of Heaven, did he bind the other side not to vote for any amendments?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, why was the gentleman from New York willing to enter a Republican caucus and to acquiesce in the will of the majority in that caucus if he is not willing that we should do the same? It is unfortunate, of course, that he happens to be a member of a party at present that is unable to caucus upon any question whatever. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] A party that is unable to unite even in the selection of their distinguished leader in this body, and unable to fill an important position in another body unmentionable here. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

It is unfortunate that this difference does exist, but the gentleman can not complain of us on that account. But let me say this, Mr. Chairman, some gentlemen on that side have frequently inquired as to what transpired in the Democratic caucus; they have shown great anxiety to know the reasons that induced members of the Democratic caucus to take action along certain lines. They can very readily obtain the information they want if they are unable to bring themselves to that state of mind where they are willing to enter a Republican caucus and to abide by the action of the caucus; they can enter a Democratic caucus, and if they are willing to be bound by the rules of a Democratic caucus they can participate in its deliberations as to legislation.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman's party recognize a distinction between a caucus and a conference?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do; the difference is this: In a caucus men are willing to enter and have full and free deliberation, and if they are in a minority, to acquiesce in the will of the majority. In a conference they are willing to go in and confer, and if a majority is against them they refuse to be bound. I prefer the caucus to the conference.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, the speech just made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will soon, in my judgment, create a national political issue, and if he stands on the side which he has now indicated he will stand upon when that issue comes before the American electorate, he will be, or ought to be, defeated.

When a man announces in advance that, upon a bill proposed to be enacted into a law for this Republic, he will enter a secret meeting, pledged in advance to permit that meeting to control his vote on that bill on this floor, he in my judgment—and I say it with all respect for him—violates the oath which he takes in this House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

No Representative in Congress, I care not who he may be, can justify himself for agreeing in advance that in helping to make laws for the people of the United States his vote shall be controlled by a party caucus.

A conference differs from a caucus. I will go into a conference interested in the welfare of the Nation, interested in the welfare of my party, but I will leave that conference free to vote as my deliberate judgment says is right, for my oath is not to support my party at the expense of the country. [Applause on the Republican side.] The oath of a Representative in Congress is that he will discharge the duties of his office to the best of his ability, and that oath will not permit him to surrender his judgment and his conscience into the keeping of a caucus.

Legislation by secret caucus is defended by some good men, but it opens the way for mediocrity and cowardice, shrinking from duty, to go before the people and say, "It was not what I wanted at all, nor what I thought right, but the caucus told me to vote for it and I obeyed." It makes the oath read like this: I solemnly swear to support the Constitution of the United States, and discharge the duties of my office to the best of my ability, "provided, of course, that I shall vote as the caucus dictates." That is the proviso in every Democrat's oath in this House if the gentleman from New York is correct. [Applause on the Republican side.]

A Representative entering a caucus pledged in advance to obey its commands, and failing to do so, is taunted with having violated his word and with being a traitor to his party. Not only this, but he is punished by being deprived of patronage.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Did not the gentleman himself enter a conference in which he pledged himself to abide by the action of the conference?

Mr. COOPER. I have refused to attend meetings called as caucuses to consider legislation, and have walked out of caucuses because unwilling to be bound by them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In relation to the Speakership, did not the gentleman go into a conference and bind himself to be bound in the last Congress?

Mr. COOPER. No, sir. The gentleman means the time that the gentleman from Illinois was elected?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think it was somebody from that section of the country. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], in opening the debate on the pending bill, said that it was strictly a revenue bill—that is, one imposing a tariff for revenue only. A tariff for revenue only means a tariff to secure revenue, without regard to anything else. The bill is one of great importance. On January 30 last the gentleman from Alabama said, in speaking of the House Tariff Board—I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date:

> I would rather have it (the Tariff Commission) appointed by the House, if I could; but if I can not, I will take a board appointed by the President, if it shall be a board only to gather facts.

Congress has directed this Tariff Board to present its facts at the meeting of Congress next December. Then the gentleman from Alabama proceeded:

> You know, and every Democrat here knows, that one of the greatest difficulties we have had to face is that when the Ways and Means Committee goes into session to ascertain the facts upon which they can write a tariff bill the only men that are sufficiently interested to come before us and give us the facts are the protected industries of the United States. And yet to-day you would vote to continue that condition, to continue to place us absolutely in the hands of these protected interests of this country for the information on which we are to write a tariff bill, and refuse to give us the board that will be composed of men who, by law, are authorized and directed to investigate under our direction, and to ascertain facts on which we can base an honest tariff legislation.

He then went on to say a little later:

That is true, if you can afford to play hide and seek with the Treasury of the United States, but it is my duty, my fellow Democrats, not only to write a tariff bill solely for revenue, but also to write one that is capable of raising sufficient revenue to run this Government, and we must know what we are doing and not guess at it. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, in the report which the gentleman from Alabama has submitted there are 539 pages, as I remember. There were no public hearings. None of the parties interested in this legislation were heard in open session. Here is the report. What do we know as to the accuracy of the conclusions embodied in this voluminous document? The gentleman from Alabama wrote the following letter, which I shall place in the RECORD, with the permission of the committee:

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 6, 1911.

Mr. R. M. MILLER, Jr., Charlotte, N. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee had their first meeting on the cotton schedule this morning. After looking over the facts before us and the briefs, they concluded not to go into general hearings on the subject.

I am in receipt of the brief you have already filed with the committee, and it will receive careful attention. Should you desire to place further facts before us, I will be glad to receive them personally, or by letter, as you desire. We will probably be at work on the cotton schedule for the next 10 days before reaching any final conclusion in reference to the matter.

Yours, very truly, O. W. UNDERWOOD, Chairman.

In other words, 10 days were given to the preparation of this measure—all in secret meetings. I am opposed to legislating in that manner. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I sympathize with the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin. I realize how unfortunate it is for one to be in such a position that he considers acquiescence in the will of the majority of his party more or less treason to his country's good. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] Of course, all of us are not so unfortunately situated. I also appreciate the gentleman's tenderness over having patronage taken from him as a result of following his convictions, but I can not but believe that his position really represents the notion of individualism run mad. He would attempt in this world of events, where every single event is both the child and the parent of dozens of others, to so segregate it as to enable him to express his individual will as to that particular event. Legislation on those terms has been impossible from the beginning of time and will be to the close. The only way the gentleman will find it possible to continue his functions properly in that way is to imitate the example of his colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER] and formulate a party of his own, where he can go into a conference with the calm assurance that whatever the result may be he will be in entire accord with it. [Laughter.]

The Democratic Party has never undertaken by caucus to stifle the conscience of its membership. The rules of that caucus expressly provide that any man may exempt himself either when he considers in conscience he is bound to vote otherwise or when he considers the mandate of his people compels him to vote otherwise.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, yes.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Kentucky if the gentleman from New York in response to my question did not say that one entering a Democratic caucus was understood to pledge himself in advance to abide its decision in his vote?

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman from New York made that statement, he made a statement that was not complete, as the gentleman himself would be perfectly willing to say. The statement——

Mr. COOPER. One moment——

Mr. SHERLEY. Let me answer your question. The caucus rules provide where a proposition is carried by two-thirds that it shall be binding upon those participating in the caucus, unless they shall be instructed by or have promised their constituency to the contrary or have constitutional objections to abiding by the decision of the caucus.

Now, the proposition that I want in all seriousness to suggest to the House, because the gentleman and some of those of like thinking are constantly assuming a virtue superior to that of the membership on that side of the House, or even the membership of this, are constantly impugning the motives and the patriotism of the regular members of the two great parties, because they believe that conference and agreement is necessary to progress in legislation—I want to suggest that this is the true test, in my judgment, that should regulate men's conduct as Members of the House. Of course, the man who comes here and surrenders what he believes to be a fundamental conviction, what he believes to be essential to the very highest interest of his Government, has shown cowardice and a willingness to submit to party will that is not to be commended, but, on the other hand, a man who has such an exalted opinion of his own ideas of government that he is not willing to acquiesce in the judgment of a majority of his party on matters of ordinary legislation by that very fact disqualifies himself for efficient service in the House of Representatives. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Most questions that come before this body do not represent such fundamental principles that a man can not afford to acquiesce in the wisdom of a majority of his colleagues.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to the gentleman that I have entered conferences, called as conferences, and abided by the decision of the majority many times.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to continue for five minutes. I will probably not use that much time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to continue for five minutes longer. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky to the trouble there is in this case. I have attended party conferences. I have gone with the majority as it has decided frequently, and I have often differed with the party conference and so voted. The trouble with your definition of a caucus is that a man entering it has pledged himself in advance to do what it dictates regardless of what that may be.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman simply states what is not the rule of the Democratic caucus.

Mr. COOPER. That is exactly what the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] said in regard to the Democratic caucus.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SHERLEY. I answer that that statement is not accurate.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SHERLEY. Just a moment. The real trouble with the gentleman from Wisconsin is more fundamental than the reasons he states. The real trouble is that he is bearing a party label when he is not in harmony with that party. That is the trouble, and it is the trouble with those who think like him. I have no criticism of the gentleman and his views. I do not agree with many of them. I have no criticism of his political coterie. But the trouble is that they are undertaking the impossible; they are undertaking to keep the name, to keep the uniform, to keep all of the insignia that point to party identity while traveling in an entirely different direction from which that party travels.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. In line with the remarks that the gentleman is making, I want to call the gentleman's attention to the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin, made at the beginning of the Sixtieth Congress, in the discussion of the resolution to adopt the rules of that Congress. At the conclusion of his speech, after he had summed up the objections he had, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] made this statement:

I think it is also unfair to adopt the pending resolution, because there are about 100 new Members and they have not seen the working of the rules and know little about them. But of course the caucus having adopted what it did adopt the other night, it does not become me to vote against the resolution.

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

I may say that I can not consistently, as a Republican—for I understand that the Republicans of the House by unanimous vote adopted this rule in caucus, and that the caucus was properly called, although I did not know it—I can not, as I say, consistently vote against the adoption of this resolution.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to say, in justice to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], that I have no doubt that at that time he did not find that irreconcilable conflict between his own political convictions and those of his party, and so he did not have the difficulty that now confronts him in regard to caucus action.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit me to say that that same extract has been read against me on the stump by men presumably as alert as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] and had no effect then, and does not have any effect with anybody now who understands the situation. That was a caucus decree. I was not here, and it was only as to the adoption of the rules. It did not go to any constitutional question. I had no opportunity to present my views to the caucus. I did protest that the rules gave more power to the Speaker than ought to be given to any man, but it was not a matter of legislation. It was simply one of procedure, of the conduct of the House of Representatives, and, not having been notified, as I was on the cars and the notice went to me at my home in Racine, I knew nothing about the caucus. I came here and found it had been called, and so I did not oppose the adoption of the rules.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's explanation is more remarkable than his action. As I understand the explanation, it is that his first excuse for abiding by his party caucus was that he did not attend the caucus. In other words—and he may be justified in this—he had rather take a Republican caucus blind than knowingly. His second explanation is that it related only to the question of rules. Now, if there has been any gentleman who has entertained the House and the country with a dissertation on the importance of rules and how the adoption of rules control legislation in the primary aspect, how it went to the very essence of government, and how we were shackling ourselves, delivering up our birthright as freemen by the adoption of rules, it is the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And yet he tells you that his position as to going into a caucus or into a conference is dependent upon two things: First, that he shall not know what the caucus does by attending it; and, second, it shall only relate to a question of procedure. Now, underneath it all does not his very attempt to make this distinction show this vital thing, that, as I said in the beginning, acts in life everywhere, as well as legislative acts, are never segregated; they never stand alone. They always bear relation to the past and to the future.

The wise man is the man who is able to answer the question—and on that depends always the willingness of Members to go into a caucus—to answer the question whether a particular thing is so vital as to require an expression of one's own views, irrespective of consequences or of party position, or whether it is not, because all of us know that all civilization is dependent upon the willingness of men to act in concert. That is the intelligent test, and it was with an eye to that test that we have given to men in the Democratic caucus the right to come out of it when they believe the matter is of such importance as that if they do not vote their conviction rather than the caucus conviction they would be violating their duties as Members here. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I do not know how far the gentleman would feel at liberty to disclose the rules of the Democratic caucus. I do not happen to have a copy of the Democratic caucus rules in my desk, although I thought I had. As I recollect, your caucus excuses a man from abiding by the caucus; first, on constitutional grounds; and, second, on the ground that he is pledged otherwise to his constituents.

Mr. CLAYTON. With the indulgence of the two gentlemen——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have the caucus rules here. I intended to have them read for information, and I think it would be well for our Republican brethren to have a copy of these rules and adopt them as the rules of their caucus. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. As for that, we are quite as likely to do that as we are to copy your legislation. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLAYTON. I send the copy up to the Clerk's desk and ask that it be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the preamble and rules as part of the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have yielded the floor for the purpose of permitting the reading of the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has now expired.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. CLAYTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, as a part of my remarks, I request that the Clerk read the preamble and rules of the Democratic caucus, adopted March 22, 1909.

The Clerk read as follows:

PREAMBLE AND RULES ADOPTED BY THE DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS.

Preamble.—In adopting the following rules for the Democratic caucus we affirm and declare that the following cardinal principles should control Democratic action:

(a) In essentials of Democratic principles and doctrine, unity.

(b) In nonessentials, and in all things not involving fidelity to party principles, entire individual independence.

(c) Party alignment only upon matters of party faith or party policy.

(d) Friendly conference and, whenever reasonably possible, party cooperation.

Democratic caucus rules.—1. All Democratic Members of the House of Representatives shall be prima facie members of the Democratic caucus.

2. Any member of the Democratic caucus of the House of Representatives failing to abide by the rules governing the same shall thereby automatically cease to be a member of the caucus.

3. Meetings of the Democratic caucus may be called by the chairman upon his own motion, and shall be called by him whenever requested in writing by 25 members of the caucus.

4. A quorum of the caucus shall consist of a majority of the Democratic Members of the House.

5. General parliamentary law, with such special rules as may be adopted, shall govern the meetings of the caucus.

6. In the election of officers and in the nomination of candidates for office in the House a majority of those present and voting shall bind the membership of the caucus.

7. In deciding upon action in the House involving party policy or principle a two-thirds vote of those present and voting at a caucus meeting shall bind all members of the caucus: Provided, The said two-thirds vote is a majority of the full Democratic membership of the House: And provided further, That no Member shall be bound upon questions involving a construction of the Constitution of the United States, or upon which he made contrary pledges to his constituents prior to his election, or received contrary instructions by resolutions or platform from his nominating authority.

8. Whenever any member of the caucus shall determine, by reason of either of the exceptions provided for in the above paragraph, not to be bound by the action of the caucus on those questions, it shall be his duty, if present, so to advise the caucus before the adjournment of the meeting, or, if not present at the meeting, to promptly notify the Democratic leader in writing, so that the party may be advised before the matter comes to issue upon the floor of the House.

9. That the five-minute rule that governs the House of Representatives shall govern debate in the Democratic caucus unless suspended by a vote of the caucus.

The foregoing preamble and rules were adopted by the Democratic caucus of the House of Representatives on this date, March 22, 1909.

HENRY D. CLAYTON, Chairman.
W. A. ASHBROOK, Assistant Secretary.

Mr. CLAYTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that, prior to the adoption of these rules defining the purpose of a caucus and its limitations, and the individual rights of a Member participating in that caucus, we had some trouble in the Democratc Party, but we have had none since these sensible and fair rules were adopted. No man is now compelled to sacrifice his conscience on a constitutional question by any caucus action, nor is he compelled to go contrary to the wishes of his constituents because of any caucus action. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do.

Mr. MANN. Just to make the record complete, I wish to make an inquiry. The rules which the gentleman has read were adopted in 1909. Do I understand these rules have been readopted by the Democratic caucus of the present Congress?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's understanding is correct. They are the existing rules governing the Democratic caucus. I commend to the gentleman, as the minority leader here, that he formulate similar rules and have his caucus adopt them [applause and laughter on the Democratic side], and then, perhaps, he can have a united party. And in that connection, if he will permit me, I will say that prior to the adoption of these fair and sensible rules we used to have a divided party and the same trouble that he has on his side now. The Democratic Party here is now coherent, forceful, and united, and is doing business in behalf of the best interests of the people.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman again yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that I have studied these rules, and the more I study them the less use I have for them. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Of course, the gentleman from Illinois is still obstinate in his adherence to Republican wrongdoing. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] You ought to get right once in a while. Of course, the more nearly right you become the more Democratic you become. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is all I desire to say. I wanted to have these rules read into the RECORD simply in view of the prophecy of my friend the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen on the other side may talk and reason and explain. They may enter into long and complex explanations and reasons and theories as to how the caucus rules and caucus actions of the Democratic Party work, but the fact of the matter is that real consideration and discussion of measures in the House of Representatives under the present system have ended. Sooner or later that fact will become apparent to the people of this country. It is a condition bound in time to work evil results to the rights and interests of the American people. We all understand that general debate, outside of the few explanatory speeches made by the leaders on each side, is a senseless and a useless thing, that nobody listens to it, that nobody is convinced by it, that no vote is influenced by it. Now, to-day, we have the remarkable object lesson of the ranking minority member of the Ways and Means Committee rising here in this House and saying in substance, "I have no amendments to offer to this bill, because this matter has been concluded in a secret caucus of the Democratic Members, and the offering of amendments and the discussion of them would be futile."

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. MADISON. Not now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MADISON. And there is not a man who sits upon the other side of this House but knows that the statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is absolutely true. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I would not now presume for one moment as a Member of the House of Representatives to offer an amendment to this bill, and I know of some amendments that gentlemen on the other side, if they had free will, if they had opportunity to act, would be glad to adopt; and so do you, every one of you. Every man who sits in this House understands that ever since the convening of this Congress every measure of importance has been determined in a secret caucus, and that the offering of amendments or the discussion of one was a futile, an idle, and a senseless thing. Why, you passed upon the publicity bill in your caucus. A gentleman from my State [Mr. JACKSON] offered an amendment before you had your system working to perfection. Some Members on that side responded to their own wills and consciences and voted for the right. Immediately the cry went up, "It is contrary to the party decision in caucus," and every one of those men, according to my recollection, came back into line. You talk about it not shackling the consciences and minds of Members. We had an absolute, practical demonstration of it here in the House of Representatives. Talk about comparison with the old system. Everyone understands that that was bad enough, but when the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill was here before us there was an opportunity given us at least to express our opinion, unshackled, upon some of the most important items in that bill, and as a result the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] offered an amendment putting petroleum and its products upon the free list, something that the American people had contended for for years, and he was appealing to a free, unshackled House; and as a result his amendment was adopted. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, after all there is a good deal of play to the gallery in all this talk about men being bound by a caucus to violate their oaths or surrender their convictions.

When this Congress assembled our Republican friends thought they were going to see this side split up into warring factions. They said when it came to revising the tariff we never could agree. That was a prediction often made. Now, on the contrary, they see this side of the Chamber united, passing one bill after another with hardly a break in our ranks, and that, Mr. Chairman, is the "nigger in the woodpile." The truth is, we are making good, and some of our friends on the other side of the aisle would gladly divert the attention of the people of the Nation from the record of this Democratic House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, these caucus rules, they say, are bad, infamous, very outrageous; but I have risen here to call the attention of the other side of this Chamber and the people of the Nation to the fact that at least three of the bills indorsed by this infamous Democratic caucus have already been passed by a Republican Senate with very few changes. If these bills are so bad, if the action of our Democratic caucuses have been so outrageous, how is it that when these bills go to the other end of this Capitol they receive a majority in a Republican Senate? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RUSSELL. A lot of Republicans voted for them here.

Mr. POU. Yes; quite a number of Republicans here voted for these bills.

Mr. RUSSELL. One bill passed unanimously.

Mr. POU. I believe the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON] voted for nearly every bill that has so far been indorsed by a Democratic caucus. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLAYTON. I desire to ask the gentleman if he does not think that it is better that the action of the party in control of the House be guided by that majority party in caucus rather than it be guided by the action of the Speaker and a little coterie of Rules Committee of his appointment?

Mr. POU. I most certainly do.

Mr. CLAYTON. In the present House the whole Democratic Party decides what the Democratic Party ought to do, whereas in Republican Congresses the Speaker and his own little select Rules Committee decided what the Republican Party ought to do. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. POU. Yes. That is what we saw here for 10 years under Republican rule, until the House of Representatives got to be a laughing stock throughout the Nation.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. I will.

Mr. JACKSON. Does the gentleman know of any bills which have come from a Democratic caucus, passed this House, and passed the Republican Senate without amendment? Were not most of the amendments that were proposed voted down in this House at the behest of the Democratic caucus?

Mr. POU. I believe the reciprocity bill was passed without any amendments; that came out of a Democratic caucus, and there have been at least two other bills passed by a Republican Senate with immaterial changes.

Mr. JACKSON. Of course the gentleman will use his judgment and we will use ours about what is material and what is immaterial. Does the gentleman mean to characterize the reciprocity measure as a Democratic measure?

Mr. POU. It would have never seen daylight without the Democratic support that it got, and your President has said so. He publicly acknowledged this support. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If I am not mistaken, a majority of the Republican Party voted against the reciprocity bill. It would not be a law to-day but for the Democratic support that it got, and it would not be on the statute books to-day but for the indorsement of the Democratic caucus.

Mr. NORRIS. That ought to be enough to condemn it.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman referred to two other bills passed by the Senate. I would like to ask him if the woolen bill is one of them?

Mr. POU. It is.

Mr. LENROOT. I am glad to know that the gentleman considers the amendments to the woolen bill immaterial. It will no doubt make it easy to agree to the conference.

Mr. POU. I did not mean to say the amendments were immaterial, except by way of comparison. I say now the amendments can not be regarded as of great importance when compared with the bills themselves that have been passed by the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POU. I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. POU. Now, Mr. Chairman, I merely rose to throw out this suggestion, and I believe I am indicating what it is that is troubling our friends on the other side. We are standing shoulder to shoulder over here, and our Republican friends on the other side are alarmed about it, because you know what that means. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But we are going to continue to stand shoulder to shoulder, and we are not going to be deterred by suggestions that anybody has violated his oath, because that is absolutely without foundation. The Democratic caucus does not require any man to violate his oath; it never has and never will.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON] had voted practically for every bill thus far indorsed by the Democratic caucus?

Mr. POU. I understand it is so.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And has he been complaining about the character of those bills?

Mr. POU. I have not heard any complaint made by the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman from Kansas makes this complaint, that the Democratic caucus has such a bad effect on him that he knows of a good amendment that ought to be adopted, but he is going to refuse to offer it. Does not the gentleman think it is the gentleman's duty to the Republican State of Kansas, which he in part represents, to offer it, and show to the country what bad Democrats we are not to take such a good amendment offered by him? [Laughter.] How can he refuse to offer that amendment? It is evident, if he does not, that the bad action of a Democratic caucus has had a horrible effect on a Republican when it makes him lie down and quit when he has a good thing. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to my friend from Kentucky that if the gentleman will agree to unshackle the minds and release all the Members on the Democratic side, I will gladly offer it, but until he does it would be futile.

Mr. JAMES. And there is this suggestion I wanted to make, where the gentleman would fail to give to his constituency the advantage of this information.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, just a moment, to contribute a little to the gaiety of nations. If the will and power of the Democratic caucus has ever been exemplified, it is in the docility displayed by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] in the defense which he makes of the Democratic caucus. In prior Congresses he was a member of the great Committee on Ways and Means, and when the Democratic caucus met it took him off that committee, and yet he kisses the hand that smote him for fear it will smite harder in the future. The power of the Democratic caucus over the minds of gentlemen on that side of the House is well shown when the gentleman from North Carolina, kicked off the Committee on Ways and Means because of his convictions, thrown out because of his beliefs, rises and attempts to defend and does defend the attitude of the caucus in throwing him onto the waste heap. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. CONNELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] a moment ago observed that he thought there is a good deal of gallery play in all this talk about caucus rule. I have sat in every Democratic caucus that has been held here, and I have felt, individually, that I was absolutely free to act according to my own conscience, and I have now heard the rules read. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], in his brilliant speech a moment ago, observed that when Democrats entered their caucus and abided by it they broke the oath which they took as Members of this House. Now, after having heard the rules read and having heard all that has been said about the freedom of Members in that caucus, I want to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if he still sticks to that statement in the presence of this House? When the gentleman has answered that, I want to ask him——

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. CONNELL. I decline to yield. [Laughter.] I want to give him an opportunity to answer a further question. I want to ask if he believes that there is ever a possibility that men who have found it impossible to abide by a Republican caucus because of its tyranny, and who have disrupted that party, will ever understand that there is a difference between the tyrannical caucus in the Republican Party, which wrought disaster, and this majestic Democratic majority which has put forth legislation in this Congress? I want to ask the gentleman to answer those two questions, and then let him get together with himself, and if he can not find some intellectual or moral or Republican reason for getting out of his own councils, let him not tell this body of Democratic Representatives, direct from the people, that because they have the courage, the wisdom, and the ability to carry out the mission for which they were sent here, they therefore violate their oaths in abiding by the magnificent American work of this Democratic majority in Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to reply to the interrogatories of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. CONNELL], who spoke of the "majestic" Democratic majority. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] I never have seen anything else so "majestic." [Laughter on the Republican side.] Think of a majority of a caucus being "majestic," especially a majority of a Democratic caucus on a tariff bill. [Laughter.] The gentleman is a scholar, a rhetorician, an eloquent orator, but really he ought to consult his thesaurus and hunt up something besides "majestic" for a Democratic caucus. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Now, I will say to the gentleman that I predicated my criticism of the caucus and of the action of the Democratic majority upon the reply made to my question by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. I asked him if a Representative who entered a Democratic caucus did so bound in advance to abide its decree. He said, in effect, yes. His answer was complete. He did not interrupt me to say that his answer was not complete. But when the character of the answer was made plain to the conscience and intelligence of the "majestic" majority [laughter] his distinguished friend, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], seeing the point, took the floor and announced what the gentleman from New York himself did not know—that the answer of the gentleman from New York was not complete. So he added a proviso and some addenda which made it quite a different thing from that first enunciated by the gentleman from New York. But I am still as much as ever opposed to having such power given to a Democratic caucus. I would not give it to a Republican caucus.

It is only an attempt, in principle, to embody here what the Republican Party in its famous convention of 1880 forever banished from its councils. I refer to the unit rule for State delegations. A few men in New York and a few in Illinois in that famous year sought to have the unit rule established and the delegates representing congressional districts bound by a majority vote of the respective State delegations. Under such a unit rule if 31 delegates of a State delegation were in favor of a proposition and 29 were opposed, the 31 delegates would vote the whole 60 in the convention. After a struggle the Republican Party forever abolished the unit rule from its conventions. The unit rule in a convention is in principle no worse than the majority or two-thirds rule in a secret caucus is in Congress. Only conferences, not caucuses, should be called to consider legislative measures. Most men, and I am one of them, are interested in their party, its traditions, and its prospects.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Do some other gentlemen on that side desire to speak?

Mr. CANNON. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand there are three gentlemen on that side.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in 30 minutes, and that 20 minutes may go to that side of the House and 10 minutes to this, as I understand four gentlemen over there desire to speak.

Mr. CANNON. That is as to this paragraph; of course, that is all you could ask for.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in 30 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, replying to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York, let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that his caucus rule provides that a Representative is excused from obeying the caucus if he declares that there is involved a constitutional question, or any other question concerning which he has pledged his constituency or upon which he was by them instructed. As to every other question than those, he must yield to the caucus. But the gentleman from New York must know that there are many questions of the greatest importance to the people of the United States that do not involve any possible infraction of the Constitution.

Some important and wrongful bills which have been proposed in the House of Representatives have not involved any constitutional question. I remember that in the Fifty-third Congress a bill was reported to extend for 50 years at 3 per cent the debts of the Pacific railroads. Had the bill gone before a caucus it would have been approved. But when it came up for debate upon the floor it took but a plain, detailed analysis of the evidence to defeat the majority of the Committee on Pacific Railroads and for the first time in 30 years defeat the men who were back of the scheme. If the policy which the gentleman now defends had then obtained, the funding bill would have been forced into a caucus. I could not have attended without agreeing in advance that I would be bound by its decree, because there was no constitutional question involved. My constituents knew nothing about the subject. I never had heard of it until appointed upon the committee. Now, I would not have attended the caucus, and so I could not have presented the argument to the caucus which I, in common with others, presented on this floor and which resulted in the defeat of the measure.

This is an illustration which overwhelmingly demonstrates the wrongful character of buck-and-gag caucus rule.

No Representative has a right thus to surrender his convictions. What is our oath? It is as follows:

I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion.

And mark this:

And that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter.

Not only "support and defend the Constitution," but also "well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office." The duties of the office include the absolute mastery of my own vote under all circumstances. [Applause.] It does not mean that I am bound only when some question of the violation of the Constitution of the United States may be involved, but that I retain the control of my vote regardless of what the question may be. I will not in advance pledge myself absolutely to abide by the decree of a caucus on questions of legislation. No gentleman can justify that. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is recognized.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, the bill pending before the House provides for a reduction of the duties on manufactures of cotton, and, I apprehend, will be voted upon to-day. A decided majority, I think I can safely prophesy, will vote for this bill. A decided minority will vote solidly against it, or, at least, a decided majority of the minority. This is a government by a majority, and the majority can only act through organization, and the majority called a party is responsible for legislation. I do not criticize the Democratic majority for going into caucus and presenting a substantially solid front. Nay, nay. If this bill is to pass, destructive to a great industry, as I believe it will be if enacted into law, and calculated to vex and harm all the people, I am glad that you are going to be responsible for it.

Several bills changing the tariff schedules have been passed at this session. Those bills may become laws. I do not know. I voted against one that has become a law, but the Democratic majority voting for it passed it. I did not agree with those Republicans on this side who voted with you Democrats to pass that bill. You did not need one of their votes. You said it was a Democratic measure, covering Democratic doctrine. You passed it, and in the Senate, substantially, Democratic votes passed it, although a minority of Republicans voted for it, and the President approved it. I did not then, and I do not now, approve it, because, I confess, it was along the lines of your platform. You claim it as your own, and you may have all the credit for it if you so desire, so far as I am concerned.

The wool bill and the free-list bill you have passed, and now you pass the cotton bill, or will before the sun goes down. I do not know whether the wool bill and the free-list bill and this bill will become laws or not. The wool bill and the free-list bill have both passed the Senate, and, if the President approves them, they will become laws.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GRAHAM). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask a few minutes outside of the half hour allotted for debate on this paragraph.

Mr. MANN. How much time will the gentleman require?

Mr. CANNON. Not exceeding 10 minutes more.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague have 10 minutes more and that the time allotted for debate be extended by 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the time of his colleague [Mr. CANNON] be extended 10 minutes and that the time allotted for debate be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, does it behoove me to try to put my head on the shoulders of any gentleman who was elected as a Republican who sees proper to vote for this bill? He is responsible to his constituency. If they do not reckon with him, I have not the power to do so.

I wish that this side, the minority, could be a unit against this bill. Ah, gentlemen say the foundation of protection was ruptured and one-third of it was wiped out of existence when you passed the reciprocity bill, "and therefore," they say, "we will pay back now and touch the Republicans in both House and Senate who voted for that bill." Well, as for me, I will keep the Republican faith.

If I have a window to protect my house, to let in the light and shut out the cold, and somebody on the outside, or perhaps one or two or a few on the inside, break one-third of it, shall I take a club and smash the other two-thirds of the window? Nay, nay; because that would leave my house completely at the mercy of the wind and the cold. I would much rather keep the protective system, or any part of it, than to destroy it entirely.

After all, in a country where the people vote every two years, and where in four years a majority can change the policy of the Government, as they have done in the past and no doubt will do in the future, we may have to face a penalty, and the only question is the size of the penalty—what is going to be the cost? Whatever it costs, the people of the United States will have to pay it, and then, having paid the penalty, they will get back on safe and solid ground.

As a mere politician, I would welcome the enactment of all these bills. You Democrats think that would be glorious; that it would float you "on flowery beds of ease" during all your lives. Now, I am of a different opinion. The proof of the pudding is the eating of it; and sometimes I have thought that the sooner you can have a free hand and eat your pudding, the sooner you will find that it is made of sawdust and that you can not fool the people.

Oh, you say, you were indorsed, and you have 60 majority in this House. Yes. I will not quarrel with you on the ground that you cooperate. If I held your views, I would agree with you in all save one thing. If I believed with you in a tariff for revenue only, I would go into caucus and cooperate. Then I would be consistent. But I would not pretend, when I set about destroying the industries of the country by reducing tariff duties below a protective rate, that I was retaining a little protection as an incident, and still say that I was for a tariff for revenue only. You do not cheat yourselves when you do that. I expect you had to do it for the sake of unanimity. We will see what becomes of this cotton bill in the Senate, when Senators from some of the cotton-manufacturing States of the South, sitting in a body where they have no previous question, have a chance to run and glorify. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I think I have said about all I desire to say at this time. I shall vote against this bill. It has already been demonstrated by speeches of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] and other gentlemen that it will absolutely shut down permanently the 50 per cent of textile spindles that are now silent because of apprehension. What the reality will be, if the bill should become a law, you can judge for yourselves. In my opinion, it would shut down substantially the remainder of the spindles, and we would buy, in diminished quantity, the products of cotton mills which would be supplied by other countries than our own.

But nothing will convince you, and nothing will convince the people who sent you here, I apprehend, except experience. Two or three times in a generation, with the old crossing over and the new coming in, with the demagogue abounding, under the lead of the college professor, there comes a great cry of "cheaper cost of living," and so forth, forgetting that if the cost of living were ever so cheap you could not live unless, as the product of your industry and labor, you had the wherewithal to buy. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, this very interesting debate, having drifted to the subject of party caucuses generally, and to our own late Democratic caucuses in particular, would be eminently incomplete unless there was some expression from one whose recent experiences are a living refutation of much that has been said against it. As is perhaps well known, I have been an everlasting kicker at some of its proceedings. I enjoy the distinction of being the ebony sheep in the fold on this side of the Chamber, but I am also a living exemplification of what can be accomplished by a kicker and an independent thinker, despite the caucus determination, because, availing myself of the liberal rules, clothing one with exemption, and coming out of the caucus thus equipped, through the courtesy of our honored and distinguished leader, I had no difficulty in saying all I ever wanted to say against the determination of the caucus, its proceedings, and the legislation outlined by it. Had I been read out of the party—which I was not—in consequence of my temerity, I should have been promptly read back into it by the indorsement of my position by every Democrat at the other end of the Capitol.

It will be remembered that I offered an amendment to the farmers' free-list bill which provided for eliminating the meat clause, and that I was the only Member on this side of the House who voted for it. I offered that amendment, Mr. Chairman, because it was in the interest of the home farmer and stock raiser and against the undue advantage which the bill gave to the foreign farmer and stock grower. Every Democratic Senator agreed with me, as was demonstrated by their recorded votes.

Mr. HILL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. HILL. I do not know that I quite understand the amendment to which the gentleman refers. I wish he would explain it. As I understand it, it puts the Democratic Party on record as being opposed to the free meat from anywhere except Canada. Is that right? I refer to the Senate amendment.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Yes; from anywhere except Canada, and it does put the Democratic Party, as represented at the other end of the forum, on record with me.

Mr. HILL. That is right.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Yes; that was the action of the Democrats in the Senate.

Mr. MANN. From Canada also, when you come to examine the amendment carefully.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Well, at most it is confined at present to Canada. The gentleman from Illinois may be correct. If he is, so much the better.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the gentleman did not intend to say that he was the only Member here who voted for his amendment in the House. The gentleman means he was the only one of the Democrats.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Yes; I was the only one on our side. It was my amendment, and I cast the only vote for it. I thought I made that clear. I know that my intelligent and good friend from Nebraska and many others of judgment and discretion on that side of the aisle voted with me for the amendment, and I am convinced that many on this side would have done so had they, as I, invoked the rule of the caucus and been privileged to do so. But, thanks to the action of the Senate, the light is not out, and they will all return to the fold of the hitherto lone black sheep.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Is it not true that every Democrat in the Senate, excepting one from Texas, voted for our bill exactly as it left the House, including free meats, and was it not a compromise vote to which my colleague refers, only after the bill had failed, and was it not the vote of Senator BAILEY that forced that compromise?

Mr. HILL. It is the final result that the people will look at.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Yes; that is what we must depend upon, the final results, and I will say to the gentleman from Connecticut, and to my colleague from Colorado, that the final results are what I am anticipating with some confidence when the bill is returned to the House, and I will say further to my colleague from Colorado that he is partly right and partly wrong. But as I have just said to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], that was the final vote of the Senate. I desire to say further to my distinguished colleague that he need not be so sensitive, because it behooves him no more to make the best defense he can for having voted against my amendment than all the other Democrats around me. All of you were as amply justified from your viewpoint as you were wrong from my viewpoint. Nevertheless it is a source of great gratification to me to know that when the bill returns to this House my Democratic associates will be prompt to follow the lone black sheep and vote for his amendment, thus placing me with the majority of my party as represented at both ends of the Capitol.

And then, Mr. Chairman, with reference to the wool bill, it will be recalled that my amendment fixed the same duties on raw wool as did the bill in the Senate, receiving over there the votes of every Democratic Senator, whereas over here my amendment received only my own vote on this side of the aisle. Now, when that bill comes back you truant Democrats will again have an opportunity to agree with me, which, under the circumstances, I know you will avail of, and the black sheep will resume his duties as sentinel, proud of his accomplishment and hopeful for the future that you will not again stray.

My vote against the reciprocity bill was one of the very few on the Democratic side, and notwithstanding the fair majority with which the bill was passed, I confidently look to the country to justify me in that vote, and I predict now that when it is officially heard from the expression of approval will be nearly unanimous. I am equally satisfied that I will be justified by the individual voters of my State on the proposition.

It is interesting in this connection to refer to the resolution offered by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], who is the honored chairman of our caucus, calling upon the President to open negotiations with Mexico for a reciprocal trade relation, such as that entered into with Canada, and it is of still further interest to witness the almost unanimous protest of the farmers of the State of Texas. I prophesy that that wave of discontent at the drift of present-day legislation against the toiling farmers of our great country will extend from the south toward the north, just as the wave of discontent at the Canadian agreement extended from the north toward the south, and the impact of the meeting of these two vigorous waves will produce a cataclysm that will be felt throughout the length and breadth of the country in 1912.

It is a piece of the irony of fate that the speech I delivered against reciprocity, and which fell as a thud upon deaf ears here, is being broadcasted in Canada by the advocates of reciprocity to convince the people over there that what I said was true—that Canada had the best part of the trade. And the frowns upon the faces of you who supported the agreement when I made that speech are changed to a broad smile at this unexpected course of events. I thus proved the angel in disguise to your fond hopes.

Right in this connection I want to add a word with respect to my position upon the wool features of Schedule K. The testimony, since this bill passed this House, has been climbing mountain high in demonstration of the cheapness with which wool can be produced abroad, thus accentuating my position that under the rates fixed by the bill as it left the House it is impossible for the American sheep grower to compete with the foreigner. The very latest testimony upon that subject comes from our consul at Uruguay, appearing in the Daily Consular and Trade Reports of this date. He says:

COST OF FEEDING FARM HELP.

An estimate of $4.65 in United States currency as the daily cost of feeding 20 peons, used as farm hands, is made by an estanciero who employs many. The items are: Meat, $2.58; coffee, 9 cents; sugar, 17 cents; biscuits, 74 cents; yerba mate (tea), 56 cents; macaroni, 25 cents; farina, 7 cents; lard, salt, etc., 19 cents. The average cost per man is thus 23½ cents, or $85 per year.

This is $7.02 per month, showing that the cost of provisions alone is only about the same sum per year as the cost for wages is here per month. It will be up to the American people to say whether we shall degrade the wage earners in this country to the level of the people in that semicivilized section of the world.

And in this same report it is shown that from January 1 to May 31, 1911, there were exported from that country to London 167,815 quarters of frozen mutton and 46,099 quarters of frozen beef.

It is further shown in this same report that the American Beef Trust Co. has now a full footing there, and it is estimated it will slaughter 200,000 head of cattle annually, at least.

It is further shown that there are 26,286,296 sheep there—about half the number we have in this country; that only 2,010,025 acres are devoted to agriculture, and 37,500,000 acres of natural pasture lands.

If further confirmatory testimony were needed along these lines it would be afforded by the widespread dissatisfaction that exists throughout the agricultural areas at the drift of present discriminating legislation in these halls. The farmers and stock growers are thoroughly united. They realize that their rights are seriously menaced. They recognize the fact, as Congress would if it paused to reflect, that in the history of all countries the soil is the mother not only of civilization itself, but of everything that civilization has brought—"Mother Earth," as it has been affectionately and truthfully termed, and the care and conservation of her bounties should be our first and most enduring concern.

It may be considered something of a digression, Mr. Chairman, but in this connection let me briefly refer to one form of neglect of a magnificent product of "Mother Earth," which confronts almost daily every Member of this House—that grand and time-honored elm that stands like a faithful but tired sentinel at the corner of Fourteenth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, at the corner of the Willard Hotel. For over a hundred summers has it cast its beneficent shade over the heat-oppressed wayfarer. Associated with the pioneer days of the Nation's capital, rich in interesting history, the lone survivor of the monarchs of past ages on that world-renowned avenue, it stands to-day with blighted foliage and decadent trunk, a living monument to neglect, "quite chapfallen," with scarce 8 square feet of surrounding earth at its base, not covered by the stones of the sidewalk and the asphalt of the street, from which to draw its nourishment. In this day of progress and enterprise how easy it would be to afford this grand old friend the means of prolonging its life full another century by drilling vents or small water holes in the rock and asphalt covering its cramped and dying roots.

This suggestion, Mr. Chairman, may seem a sentimental departure in my remarks, but it has, nevertheless, in its simple way, a direct bearing upon the point I urge, namely, that we owe much to the agricultural industry and to the expectant farmer, whose whole interest and livelihood are involved in its preservation. This, I affirm, is not a mere sentimental outburst, but an appeal for the performance of a manifest duty.

Mr. Chairman, we may indulge here as much as we may in fine-spun tariff theories, quoting opinions of those long dead, and applauding to the echo the sentiments of the living on this vital subject, but, after all, remember that one-third of the voting population of this country is engaged in agricultural pursuits. Barring the short life of the Wilson tariff bill, there has never been any serious assault made upon this foundation stone and bulwark of our greatness, and in my judgment those who are responsible for this attack will be more famed in history for temerity than for wisdom.

I sometimes wonder, Mr. Chairman, if there is not a gentlemen's agreement, or understanding, between the cotton, wool, and other manufacturers, seeing that there must be some bricks taken out of the tariff wall, so far as their product is concerned, to recoup losses thus sustained by them by bringing all the raw product to a free basis. This belief I find to be quite general since the Senators representating the manufacturing States, regardless of party at times, touch each other's shoulders when there is a suggestion looking to the reduction of duties upon the raw material, or the making of them absolutely free, and at the same time giving ample protection to the manufactured product. As a representative of the agricultural interests, personally I will welcome the issue.

I did not intend, Mr. Chairman, to go so far afield of the discussion in interim, and will now direct my wandering footsteps again to the subject of the caucus.

The chief difficulty is not with the caucus as an entity, but the great difficulty has reference to the practice in the caucus; in other words, theoretically it may be right, but practically it is wrong. If gentlemen who belong to the party holding the caucus would but exercise the right accorded them, and which is amply and clearly provided for by our caucus rules, and invoke their privilege, there would be greater independence and more likelihood of arriving at correct conclusions as a result of the free and open discussions thus afforded.

I ventilated my views upon this subject when the woolen schedule was before the House, and if the House will indulge me in a brief repetition, I will repeat what I said at that time:

I am not an absolute unbeliever in the principle and policy of caucus action, but I am unalterably opposed to the principle and propriety of a caucus determination, unless it is the outcome of a full, fair, and free discussion of the merits, as well as demerits, of any measure which it is proposed to enact into a law, and after ample opportunity has been afforded individual Members to give expression to their views upon the subject. It is manifestly impossible, in the consideration of a measure of such far-reaching and vital importance to such a large class of people, to accord it the full consideration it merits within the restricted space of 10½ hours for debate, especially when such debate is confined to the members of the committee presenting the measure for caucus action. Such a time limit and such withholding of opportunity for an intelligent understanding of the character and import of the proposed measure renders it impossible for any unbiased Member of this House conscientiously and under his oath to give his support to the resolution of the caucus.

Mr. Chairman, aside from the members of the Ways and Means Committee, previous to the assembling of the caucus, it is doubtful if there is a Member of this body who knew just what rates were to be incorporated in this bill. It was an open secret that it was the purpose of the committee to carefully withhold the information, both from the Members of the House and the public at large—a species of unjustifiable cloture policy that I confess it is utterly beyond me to sympathize with. It would be a direct reflection upon the intelligence of the constituency which elected me to membership in this body to suppose that they would believe me capable of blindly acquiescing in a decision upon such an important matter and without an opportunity for its proper consideration. What I have said should not be construed as an arraignment of the Committee on Ways and Means, for I believe they were inspired by a disposition to conserve the interests of the country and the party as well; but, I repeat, I can not give my sanction and approval to any legislation the propriety of and the necessity for which I have been unable, through lack of opportunity afforded by the caucus of my party, to understand and discuss.

I desire to call attention to the fact, in passing, that there is a misprint in the matter I have just quoted. I said there were 10½ hours allowed for debate. It should have been only eight and one-half.

Something has been said, especially by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] to the effect that one did not dare oppose the caucus determination for fear of being politically punished by the powers, and therefore there was coercion and stifling of independent thought and action. I have made it plain that, personally, I was not coerced. My voice was not stifled. I gave voice to my independent thought and followed it with an independent vote. If there has been any insidious design on the part of the powers to inflict punishment upon me for the course I pursued I am unaware of the contemplated drubbing, and whoever imagined that I was being punished has doubtless suffered some disappointment.

Mr. Chairman, I am reluctant to believe that there is on the great Ways and Means Committee a man so narrow-minded and self-centered as to be unwilling to accord to an associate in his own party that degree of independence of thought and action which should characterize every member of any deliberative body. Similarly, I hesitate to admit that there are in every legislative body some drones as well as cowards, who willingly shelter their impotency and timidity under the protecting cloak of the caucus rules. I can never subscribe to this ignominious surrender of manhood and individuality while I remain a Member of this House, for if I should ever, however slightly, follow their example I should instantly realize that my usefulness in congressional life will have ceased.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, it is a pleasure to know that I am in accord with my party upon the present bill. The cotton manufacturer of the South especially is in an exceedingly favorable position. He is blest with a climate peculiarly adapted to the manufacturing process. He has cheap labor, cheap fuel, and has the cotton in the field behind his factory, and it would seem that he can easily compete with the Japanese manufacturer, who buys his cotton from the same field, ships it to Japan, manufactures it into cloth, and exports the cloth to all countries, three-quarters around the globe, and where it gathers a profit to itself at every stopping place.

Contrast the cotton farmer with the woolgrower. The former has not only a market at his very door free of freight cost, but has a monopoly of the home market and for his surplus all Europe and all the Orient, and he has such a monopoly abroad that the very cotton he sells from his fields goes to Europe, and much of it is brought back in cloth, whereas our wool men, most of them are from a thousand to fifteen hundred, and in some cases as much as 2,000, miles or more away from their markets—Boston, Philadelphia, and New York, having no home manufacturers—and their product being burdened by the long haul and excessive freight rates, subject to further curtailment of profit at the hands of the commission men and always a ready prey of the unconscionable speculator.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the pending bill, and my supreme regret is that my good friends on this side could not consistently have joined me in support of my attitude on the reciprocity bill as well as my amendment to the free-list bill and my amendment to the wool bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, without impugning the motives or questioning the honesty or wisdom of any Member on this question, I want to offer a few observations against the caucus rule and caucus control on legislative propositions. I believe that we have had illustrations here during this Congress that exemplify the proposition that in a legislative assembly such as this there should never be a caucus on any concrete proposition of legislation.

From the very nature of our duties it is, it seems to me, contrary to their conscientious fulfillment. We are elected as Members of the House of Representatives. The law provides for an open discussion; the Constitution provides even for a record vote when one-fifth of the Members present shall demand it. It is intended that our work should be open and aboveboard before all our countrymen. But what is the practice at the present time? We find the majority party meeting in caucus, taking up a bill that, if understood and intelligently considered, should take a week and deciding upon that important measure in all its details at one sitting in one evening. The doors are closed, the curtains are drawn, the public is excluded, and everything is done in secret.

Then these men take the measure that they have considered in this secret caucus, bring it before the country, and go through the silly formula of permitting men to offer amendments, and the Members who are pledged by that secret caucus vote down every proposition regardless of whether it appeals to them favorably or otherwise. Thus has the caucus been able to control the action of officials of the Government. An unofficial organization in secret controlling the official action of official men!

I want to say to you, gentlemen, that this is wrong in principle and the American people will not stand for it indefinitely. When they realize and understand that their Representatives' hands are tied and their Representatives' votes are controlled by a secret caucus, by unofficial action of that caucus, they will rise in their might and condemn any party that stands for it.

You have said that you want to get rid of the czar. You have renounced the czar and sworn allegiance to a king. You have jumped out of the frying pan into the fire. Hold up your manacled, wounded, bleeding, shackled hands and let the country see your parliamentary slavery! Why do you not renounce your allegiance to king caucus and give your consciences an opportunity to act?

We have in this House a membership of 391. We have 228 Democrats, and a majority of that majority would be 115. One hundred and fifteen men can control the caucus, and that caucus can control the House. As a matter of fact, less than 115 men have controlled every caucus that you have ever held. So we have 115 men in secret unofficial caucus controlling the action of 391 men, and through them enact laws for the control of 90,000,000 people.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Not now. If I have more time I will.

Mr. FOWLER. Just one word.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I have one word myself. Let me make my speech in my own way. I have stood for these principles when my party was in power the same as I stand for them now. It will be no answer for you to say that the other party did the same thing when it was in power, and it will be no answer to the American people to say that. You can not prove that you ought to go to heaven by proving that I ought to go to hell.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I stated in reply to an inquiry by the gentleman from Wisconsin that the difference, in my opinion, between a caucus and a conference was that—in a caucus men are willing to enter and have full and free deliberation, and if they are in the minority, to acquiesce in the will of the majority, and in a conference they are willing to go in and confer, and if a majority is against them, they refuse to be bound.

The gentleman from Wisconsin imagines that that is a violation of a man's oath of office. He overlooked entirely the fact that if a Representative knows in advance that he has certain fundamental convictions upon some question which he can not yield, then he should remain out of the caucus and he would not be bound by it. It is somewhat amusing to me to-day to find the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON] at least inferentially condemning me for being willing to enter a caucus of the Democratic Party and abide by its results, because my memory is not so short that I do not recall that they were quite instrumental in excoriating me during the past two years because I refused to be bound by a caucus upon a matter upon which I had firm convictions and which happened to be a matter upon which they insisted the entire Democratic membership should be bound because in accordance with their ideas. Now they complain that we are willing to caucus upon matters that they think are not so important.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understood the gentleman, he states that I was one of the men who condemned him for not following the caucus.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman was one of that group.

Mr. NORRIS. I thought the gentleman was wrong, and I have condemned him on occasion many times, but never have I condemned him for refusing to follow the caucus rule.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, well, that was the only ground of condemnation, because I was right as far as the suggestions I made for the modification of the rules were concerned, because so far as I am aware all of the regular Republicans voted for my modifications in the last Congress, and all of the gentleman's friends, as well as the Democrats, voted for them in this Congress, so that they have been unanimously indorsed by the two sides of the House, and the only condemnation that could have been invoked upon me was that I did not follow the caucus rule. It ill becomes the gentleman now to make this charge.

What is the fact? Here is a bill to revise rates upon certain items affected by the tariff law. Some gentlemen think the duty should be 25 per cent, some think it should be 20 per cent, and some think it should be 15. Each individual can not have the particular rate that in his opinion is accurate, and so it is necessary for them to accommodate their differences and to agree upon some rate in which all will acquiesce. The Republicans now protest because the Democrats are not willing to permit them to unite in their conferences and keep the rate up to such figures as will again meet the condemnation of the people. Members on this side of the House have come together in caucus, not in some secret caucus; they met in this Hall, and the actions of the caucus and the proceedings were very fully published; and after considerable discussion and interchange of views they agreed upon the precise rates that they are willing shall be fixed, and the Democrats at this time are willing to stand by such rates and to defend their action.

Gentlemen have complained about these so-called secret caucuses and what they have done. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON], and, if I be not mistaken, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] have all found the result of these Democratic caucuses so very excellent during this Congress that my recollection is that they have voted for every single measure indorsed by a Democratic caucus. They could not do that when the Republicans caucused or when the Republicans agreed on legislation without caucus. What complaint can they have when the legislation is so beneficial that they are compelled to vote for it? It must meet their views, or they are surrendering their convictions in so voting. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. On spool thread of cotton, crochet, darning, and embroidery cottons, on spools, reels, or balls, or in skeins, cones, or tubes, or in any other form, 15 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I am not willing to let go unchallenged the very personal statement which Mr. MANN, the distinguished leader of the minority, saw fit to make respecting myself. I want to say to him right here that having known him as long as I have I hardly expected that statement from him. Now, it is not true that I have ever been kicked off any committee of this House. It is not true that I was kicked off the Committee on Ways and Means. Mr. CLARK, the Speaker, would verify that fact if he were in the Chamber. Before I ever knew how the committees were to be chosen, and at a time when I thought the Speaker was going to name the committees, I had a conference with Mr. CLARK, and I will state furthermore that before there was ever a suggestion of opposition to my remaining on the committee I said to the Speaker that I would prefer to go off the Ways and Means Committee—that I really preferred other assignments. He has verified that statement in the press. I suppose the verification did not attract the attention of the distinguished leader on the other side, and I will ask unanimous consent to put my own statement, together with what Mr. CLARK said about it, in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The statement is as follows:

[From the Raleigh News and Observer of Jan. 17, 1911.]

WASHINGTON, January 16.

Congressman POU to-day issued the following statement:

"Before the holiday recess and before there was any suggestion of opposition to the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee who voted against free lumber, it was agreed between Mr. CLARK and myself that I would probably go off the Ways and Means Committee, if he gave me certain assignments which he had in view and which were very much preferred by me. The suggestion that I ought to go off the committee in that event came from me. When it was announced that no man who voted as I did could remain on the committee, I thought we might as well fight out the difference. I know that this announcement did not receive the approval of Mr. CLARK or Mr. UNDERWOOD, and I know also that Mr. CLARK would have insisted on my remaining on the committee if the fight along this line had been kept up, and I have an idea that his wishes would have prevailed.

"NOTHING TO FIGHT FOR.

"It is now understood perfectly that there is to be no discrimination against anyone on account of any vote heretofore cast, and it is also understood that as far as possible all differences are to be held in abeyance during the Sixty-second Congress. So far as I am concerned, I can not see that anything is left to fight for, and I think it would be puerile for me to continue to fight for a place I had already voluntarily agreed to give up and to decline to accept assignments which my friends know I very much prefer because some report sent out from Washington has said I could not again be elected on the Ways and Means Committee. I shall accept the places which Mr. CLARK and Mr. UNDERWOOD ask me to accept. I have made no campaign for any position, have not solicited support from my colleagues, and have only written two letters about committee assignments in response to letters written by colleagues to me.

"From the day I came to Washington, before Congress met, I have done what I could, absolutely regardless of any personal ambition, to help settle in a proper and honorable manner all differences which were calculated to divide the Democrats of the House. I believe both Mr. CLARK and Mr. UNDERWOOD will very cheerfully indorse this statement. The prospects for Democratic victory in 1912 are so bright that I would feel like a criminal if I had pursued any other course. I would gladly serve on the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics, if by so doing I can help elect a Democratic President in 1912.

"WILL SUPPORT KITCHIN.

"The tentative agreement reached is entirely agreeable to me. I could not be better satisfied, even if I had made a fight from a selfish standpoint. I think the country will see the Democrats of the next House more united, if possible, under the leadership of Mr. CLARK and Mr. UNDERWOOD than we have ever been before. North Carolina will have representation on a larger number of the great committees which formulate and control legislation than ever before. I shall very gladly support Mr. KITCHIN in the caucus for a place on the Ways and Means Committee. His services deserve the very highest recognition.

"If I have done what is best to promote the success of my party without surrendering one iota of the principles in which I believe; if I have done what is best for the interest of my colleagues from North Carolina; if the result shall enable me to show my gratitude to some of those who for years have so loyally supported me, it would seem that I have some reason to be content."

Hon. CHAMP CLARK read Mr. POU's statement before it was given to the press, and said:

"Every word of Mr. POU's statement respecting what took place between him and me is the exact truth. His course from the beginning is deserving of the highest commendation."

Mr. POU. Now, I will say furthermore to the gentleman from Illinois, that I got the assignments I wanted, particularly one. I was in the beginning and am now perfectly satisfied with my committee assignments. The caucus did more for me than I have ever deserved, and I stood up in the caucus and put in nomination the gentleman from my own State, who is now on the Committee on Ways and Means. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I was willing then and would be now to make any reasonable sacrifice consistent with honor and dignity to aid the great party to which I belong, because under God I believe its principles are right. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now those are the facts about this matter, and in order to settle the facts for all time to come, if anybody wants to challenge the statement I have made, I shall ask the Speaker to say whether I have correctly stated what occurred. I do not see him in the Chamber, but he has already done this in the press, and I know he would not hesitate to do so again. Now, having said this much, I am sure the gentleman from Illinois will be willing to correct his statement that I was kicked off a committee. If the statement had been true, does not the gentleman think it is a blow just a little below the belt? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I rarely indulge in any personal reflections in the House, and I should not have made the reference I did to the gentleman from North Carolina, but I thought that he was striking below the belt in referring to the gentleman from Kansas; that he delivered a foul blow, and I thought it was perfectly proper for me to refer to what I did. I am glad to know from the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] that he was not kicked off the Ways and Means Committee. I have always had profound respect for the gentleman from North Carolina, and I still entertain that respect. I think it was a great mistake for the Democratic caucus to take or leave the gentleman from North Carolina, who has been for years a prominent and respected member of the Committee on Ways and Means, off the committee. The gentleman says that it was done at his request. I accept the statement of the gentleman. Even he in advance recognized the march of coming events, and knew that it was the intention of the Democratic caucus to leave off the Ways and Means Committee those Members on the Democratic side who did not agree in advance to be bound hand and foot by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2366. An act to acquire land along the course of Rock Creek for the purpose of preventing the pollution and obstruction thereof and of connecting Potomac Park with the Zoological Park and Rock Creek Park and providing a new location for the United States Botanic Garden.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 130) making appropriations for certain expenses of the House of Representatives incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress.

THE COTTON SCHEDULE.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. On cotton cloth, not bleached, dyed, colored, stained, painted, printed, or mercerized, containing yarn the highest number of which shall not exceed No. 50, 15 per cent ad valorem; containing yarn the highest number of which shall exceed No. 50 and shall not exceed No. 100, 20 per cent ad valorem; containing yarn the highest number of which shall exceed No. 100, 25 per cent ad valorem. On cotton cloth, when bleached, dyed, colored, stained, painted, printed, or mercerized, containing yarn the highest number of which shall not exceed No. 50, 20 per cent ad valorem; containing yarn the highest number of which shall exceed No. 50 and shall not exceed No. 100, 25 per cent ad valorem; containing yarn the highest number of which shall exceed No. 100, 30 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

When I was interrupted this morning by the extreme courtesy of a gentleman on that side of the House objecting to my proceeding for five minutes, a courtesy which is appreciated by other Members as well as by myself, and without any feeling on my part, I was calling attention to a statement on page 46 of the report which undertakes to show that the tariff cotton schedule costs the people of this country $200,000,000. I do not propose to discuss that except as to the method of arriving at the result.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] reports that the total cotton goods consumed in the United States amounts to $839,241,675 in mill value, and says that this is increased 25 per cent by reason of the tariff schedule, and then figures up how much the increase is. He figures the increased cost to the American people at $209,593,673. I was curious when I looked at these to ascertain how the gentleman arrived at his last figures. And it is apparent that the eminent statistician employed by the gentleman from Alabama took 25 per cent, or endeavored to take 25 per cent, of the total value of the goods consumed. In other words, claiming that the goods were increased in value 25 per cent, he endeavored to divide $839,241,675 by 4, in order to get the 25 per cent advance. Even in that the gentleman was not able to make a correct computation. Even in dividing a sum by 4 the gentleman is unable to arrive at a correct result, because if you divide the sum which he gives by 4 in order to get 25 per cent, instead of making $209,593,673, it would make $209,810,418.75. If he had said $209,000,000 was 25 per cent of the total sum, I should have been perfectly agreeable to that, but when he figures it down to $3 at the end, and his computation is several hundred thousand dollars out of the way, as a mere matter of arithmetical division by 4, I should have supposed that the gentleman's great statistician at least had gone far enough to be able to divide by 4.

But take the theory of the computation. If these goods had a certain value at the mills, and 25 per cent was added to that value, it would make a total value of 125 per cent of the cost. The 25 per cent which the gentleman says is added is not added to the selling cost; it is added to the producing cost. And in order to get the correct figures of a 25 per cent advance on the goods, it would be necessary to take 100 per cent, based upon 125 per cent, and instead of dividing the cost of the goods when consumed and after the 25 per cent is advanced by 4, it should be divided by 5 or divided by 125, and thereby get 1 per cent, and take 100 times that.

Here we have a computation which the grammar-school boys and girls in the sixth or seventh grades will understand. Every school child knows that when you add 25 per cent to a fixed sum you make then a total of 125 per cent. The gentleman arrives at a result of $209,593,000, but if the school children of the land were to compute this, they would make it $167,848,335, a mere trifling difference of $41,745,338 of an error.

But what is $41,000,000 to a Democratic caucus or a Democratic program, or the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the Democratic side, if they can come within $41,000,000 of being correct? That is nearer than they usually get.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DONOHOE] is recognized.

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Chairman, before this bill came before the House for consideration I felt that the conditions in my district, as well as the pledges which I had made in my campaign, justified my being in a position to vote for or against it, according as my constituents might desire, and therefore I took steps to exempt myself from caucus action.

In the six congressional districts comprising the city of Philadelphia we have upward of 200 cotton mills, one-half of which I understand are in my district. In order to test the sentiment of those most interested and best informed in the textile industry I sent the following letter to a gentleman whom I have known for many years as an honest labor leader and one of the most active in promoting the well-being of his fellow workers:

JULY 29, 1911.

Mr. FRANK MCCUSKER,
Kensington Labor Lyceum Hall, Philadelphia, Pa.

MY DEAR SIR: Inclosed please find copy of the Underwood cotton bill, which is now before the House. I wish you would have a talk with a number of your friends—both manufacturers and workers—as early as possible and advise me as to how they regard the proposed measure. In such matters I feel that as their Representative in Congress I should be governed by the wishes of the people, and so if those who know the textile business better than I do declare that the bill would be injurious to the textile industries, I will not only vote against it but, regardless of my personal opinion, do whatever is in my power in opposition to its passage.

The favor of an early reply will be appreciated.

Very truly, yours,

(Signed) MICH'L DONOHOE.

In answer to that letter I received this morning a telegram which reads:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., August 3, 1911.

Mr. MICHAEL DONOHOE, Washington, D. C.:

Vote for Underwood bill; instruction from Upholstery Weavers No. 25.

FRANK MCCUSKER.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Having received this request from faithful representatives of the operatives in the cotton mills of my district, and having received no contrary word from anyone in that district, I will gladly vote in favor of the bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, the Democratic Party is no longer composed of divided and discordant elements. To-day we present a solid front to the divided, broken, and shattered elements of the Republican Party. Democratic unity, Democratic harmony, and Democratic enthusiasm now mark the conduct of the Democratic Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

"In the multitude of counsel," the Good Book tells us, "there is wisdom." The Democratic caucus is the place where we have this multitude of full and free Democratic counsel. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And, Mr. Chairman, when we come forth from that Democratic caucus and present our measures to the Congress and the country we have been fortunate enough, so far, to have not only the Democratic people of the country indorse those measures, but thousands of patriotic Republicans have done so. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, behold to-day the ridiculous attitude of the Republican Party in this House. Gentlemen of the minority—and you know it pleases me more than I can tell you to call you the minority. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] Gentlemen who have been lashed with the whip of public opinion, lashed until you were driven from power, now consume hours at great cost to the people in discussing the Democratic caucus instead of discussing and offering measures that will tend to relieve the people of the burdens that you have put upon them during all the years that you have been in power. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, there is method in their madness. Their purpose is clearly disclosed. When I was a boy I used to fox-hunt a great deal, and the yelping of a pack of hounds is still sweet music to my ears. I used to go out into the woods in the springtime when the mother fox had her young hid away in a hollow log or in a hole in the ground, and the minute that she heard the sound of my horn calling my dogs for the chase she would come between her young and the dogs, and with this foxy performance she would lead the dogs off in another direction, away from where her young were. She did it to protect her treasures. Mr. Chairman, under the splendid leadership of the able and distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] [prolonged applause on the Democratic side] the Democratic Party in this House has been storming the citadel of high-tariff protection, and day after day we are dismantling this infamous stronghold of the Republican Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Like the old fox, you Republicans are trying to turn the attention of the country from just tariff legislation to a discussion of a Democratic caucus and other things with which you hope to deceive the public. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Good Book tells us that "by their fruits ye shall know them." What are the fruits of our Democratic caucus? A reciprocity agreement with Canada [applause on the Democratic side], a woolen schedule, against which you voted, and a farmers' free-list bill have all passed this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And when the people of the country learn of your attack on our Democratic caucus and recall that these measures are the fruits of a Democratic caucus they will say, "Long live the Democratic caucus." [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, after listening to the discussion which has just proceeded, and which has been going on for several hours, I wish, at the risk of being considered out of order, to say a few words with reference to the provisions of the bill before the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I find in the report which is given to this House as an excuse for presenting to it this bill, a statement on page 27 which, while it perhaps may be technically accurate, is in fact so misleading and, as generally understood, so utterly incorrect, that I can not let it pass unchallenged. Upon that page I find the following:

In paragraph 328, including the bulk of imports of stockings, hose, and half hose, the act of 1909 increased the rates of duty on the cheapest class, valued at not more than $1 per dozen pairs, from 50 cents per dozen pairs and 15 per cent to 70 cents per dozen and 15 per cent.

On the same page I also find this:

The increases, affecting the cheaper grades, were heavy and of serious concern to the people of moderate means, and hence to the greater part of our population.

Then, on the same page also:

On the cheapest class of goods affected, those valued at not more than $1 per dozen pairs, the average ad valorem rate on the imports of 1910 under the increased duties was 91.23 per cent.

And based, as I suppose, upon this statement contained in this report the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] a few days ago rose in his seat and inquired of one of the speakers upon this side if he was not aware that the rate of duty upon the hosiery which the poor man purchased was fixed under the Payne bill at 91 per cent, and that the percentage decreased as it went into the higher values.

The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that paragraph 328 does not apply to the cheapest class of hose at all and that the rate of duty upon the cheapest class of hose was not increased by the Payne bill. On the contrary, the rate of duty imposed upon the poor man's hose by the Payne bill is exactly the same as it was in the Wilson bill, with no difference whatever. The present bill reduces it to 20 per cent. Instead of 91.23 per cent upon the hose which the poor man buys, the duty in the Payne bill is, in fact, only 30 per cent. Paragraph 328 of the Payne bill refers by its terms to stockings and hose which are selvaged and seamless.

All hosiery, both under the Payne bill and under the one now under consideration, is divided into two great classes—those that are selvaged and seamless and those that are not. Those referred to in paragraph 328, namely, those that are selvaged and seamless, are not the cheaper grades, but are the more expensive hose, such as gentlemen in this House wear, if any of them actually wear seamless hose, as I think very few of them do, for many hose sold at 25 cents per pair are not seamless. These hose cost, in the cheaper grades, in Europe over 90 cents per dozen; that is, over 7½ cents per pair. Will any gentleman explain to me how it would be possible to bring these hose over into this country and add a duty which, under the Payne law was 70 cents per dozen and 15 per cent ad valorem, amounting to a little over 6 cents per pair, and then to sell them for 10 cents per pair? The poor man's hose is sold at from 5 to 10 cents per pair, and a well-wearing pair can be bought for the latter figure. Such hose does not come under this classification, and could not, for the reason that it is not seamless, and there is none imported under section 328.

They cost in Europe only from 40 to 60 cents per dozen. The importation of them here is not great; but if the duty on these cheap stockings is reduced in accordance with this bill, it would make so little difference, only about half a cent a pair—less than what the workingman pays for his evening paper and then throws away—that nobody would know the difference in the retail price.

Now, I went into a store this morning and bought over the counter a pair of hose for 5 cents, and a fairly good and quite smooth pair it is, as anyone can see. [Producing the hose.] Does any gentleman say that upon that poor man's hose which you could buy for 5 cents, that under the provisions of the Payne bill it pays a duty of 6 cents per pair? Why, this must be the sort of figures from which this report obtains the $200,000,000 which it alleges the American people pay in addition to what they ought under the Payne bill.

Mr. Chairman, while cotton has advanced nearly 100 per cent, the skill of the American workman and ingenuity of the American manufacturer, developed under the protective system, furnish to-day to the American workman a cheaper and better hose than he ever purchased before. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa labors under the general mistake that the most of his party do in considering the report on a tariff bill. The very cheapest class of goods, the very common 5-cent goods, as he expresses it, are not worn by the poor people of this country, I am glad to say. They are not imported to any extent and not used to any extent. The report very naturally referred to the goods that are really worn by the poorer people of the United States that come in this first class of the second section of hosiery. I hold in my hand a copy of the Treasury report, and I find that the hosiery valued at not more than $1 a dozen pairs for the year 1910 the ad vlorem rate was 91.23 per cent. Now, those are the goods that the people who labor wear.

The next grade of goods valued at more than $1 and not more than $1.50, as shown by the Treasury's report, the ad valorem duty on that class of goods for 1910 was 76.37 per cent. But for hosiery of the grade of goods fixed by the Payne bill that is valued at more than $1.50 and not more than $2, the average ad valorem duty was 63.59.

So that the rate, if the gentleman will examine the figures of that class of hosiery, runs from 25 to 30 per cent higher on the class of hosiery that is used by the people of means as against that which is actually used and worn by the laboring people in this country.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will say that I inquired of one of the largest department houses in the city and was informed that these selvage and seamless hose were not sold in the city for less than 25 cents. Does the gentleman say that the American laboring man wears hose at that price?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will look at the report of production, he will find very few of such grade hose as are used by anybody that the American people have got to put shoes on.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I want to say that the gentleman is entirely in error. He is correct in saying that there are very few imported, but there is an enormous amount made to-day by American mills, which will be closed up by the bill which the gentleman has prepared. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman is mistaken. I recognize that the duty on that class of hosiery in the Payne bill was a prohibitive duty and that they could not import any, and it put those poorer class of goods absolutely in the hands of the manufacturers. But the gentleman will find that there is comparatively little of the lower grade of hosiery worn in this country and that the class pointed out in the report in the second paragraph is the hosiery that the poor people in this country wear.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that since the passage of the present law all hosiery, and especially that on which the duty was increased, has been selling at a much lower price than ever before?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly, and I explained that—that the panic caused by the gentleman's bill brought to the American people demoralization of all business, and they had to throw their goods away. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. No; but the prices dropped before you had your election, when things were booming here the price of hosiery went down all over the United States. The gentleman can not get out of it that way. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], in discussing the hosiery schedule, characterized me with wearing silk stockings. [Laughter.] I want to deny that proposition. I never saw a pair of silk stockings in my life, much less wear such things. [Prolonged laughter.] I have had enough trouble in supplying myself and family with the cheaper cotton grades. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CLAYTON. I would like to interrupt the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. With pleasure.

Mr. CLAYTON. I want to express the hope that after my friend from Illinois has served two or three terms in Congress he may be able still to say truthfully that he never saw a pair of silk stockings. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, if I should have the good fortune to serve a second or a third term in Congress, I want to say to my distinguished friend from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] that I still do not expect to be able to wear a pair of silk stockings. [Prolonged laughter.]

While it is true that I have not had the pleasure of using any of these high-grade stockings, I have had a great deal of trouble in possessing some of the lower grades of stockings, because of the high duty of 91 per cent which has been placed upon that grade which I wear. [Laughter and applause.] The Dingley bill divided stockings into six grades. The Payne-Aldrich bill retained these six grades. The first three of these grades are the grades that the poor people of this country wear. Instead of keeping the tariff on these grades as it was fixed in the Dingley bill, the Payne bill raised the tariff on every one of these cheap grades of stockings; but, Mr. Chairman, when they came to the higher grades, approaching the silk-stocking grade, they kept the old duty of the Dingley bill, and never dared to increase the rates upon a single one of the stockings worn by the rich in this country. Mr. Chairman, when we analyze the amount of revenue paid into the Treasury of this country last year from the sale of these three cheap grades, it is more than $3,000,000. The amount paid into the Treasury from the sale of the three higher grades is less than $105,000. From these figures we see that the poor people of this country paid to the Government nearly 25 times as much money as the rich people for the right to wear stockings, and at the same time the poor people wore the coarse, rough grades and the rich people wore the fine mercerized goods.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of my colleague may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, for the once I bow my head to my distinguished colleague from Illinois. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, the lowest grade of stockings, those which do not cost more than $1 per dozen, paid into the Treasury of this country last year more than $1,000,000 to help defray the expenses of this Government. These are the stockings worn by the poorest people, yet they are taxed with a duty of 91.23 per cent. The finest grade of stocking, that grade which is worth more than $5 a dozen, paid into the Treasury of this Government the enormous sum of $17,000 to help defray the expenses of the Government. This grade, the rich people's stocking, is taxed with a duty of 55 per cent. This shows that the poorest people paid a sum equal to 6,890 per cent of what the richest people paid, yet my distinguished friends on the other side stand here and tell us that we ought to keep up the high tariff upon the poor people of this country and cause them to suffer for another long 12 months waiting for the Tariff Commission to make its report. This commission has now been at work about two years, and it has made a report on but one article, and that is wood pulp for newspapers. At this rate it will require 8,000 years to make its report upon the 4,000 dutiable articles in the Payne law.

Mr. Chairman, when I see my distinguished progressive Republican friends on the other side freely and voluntarily joining us in our efforts to relieve the masses from the burdens of unjust discrimination, I feel exceedingly happy. They have been and now are doing a noble work. I can gladly splice hands with them and call them brothers. It was their influence, combined with the influence of the Democratic Party, which gave me a seat here in this Congress. To the Republicans of my district I owe much for their support. While I am grateful to them as well as to my Democratic friends, yet I owe my allegiance to all and not a part of the people of my district.

Mr. Chairman, when I find these gentlemen almost with us, and then when I hear them trying to pick a flaw in the rules of the Democratic caucus, I am reminded of a story of a law firm consisting of an atheist and a Christian, in which the atheist had made a contract for $1,000 as a fee for winding up an estate. The Christian made another contract for $1,500 and settled up the estate, after which he came into the office and said to the atheist, "I have settled up the affairs of that estate and collected the fee." The atheist replied, "Suppose you give me my part." "What is your part?" "I think I ought to have $500." "Very well," said the Christian, and wrote out a check for $500. Then he said, "After I took charge of that case I made a new contract." "You did?" "Yes." "What was the contract?" "I made a contract for $1,500." The atheist then said, "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian." [Laughter and applause.] And that is the way with my distinguished progressive Republican friends. They say to us by their conduct in voting with us here, "Almost thou persuadest us to be Democrats." [Applause on the Democratic side.] Come along, gentlemen, we will take you with us and march on to victory with you in 1912 and share the honors with you. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to get along with the bill, and I would like to ask the gentleman to wait until the next paragraph is reached.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, without objection. [After a pause.]. The Chair hears no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

8. On plushes, velvets, velvetcens, corduroys, and all pile fabrics, cut or uncut, whether or not the pile covers the entire surface; any of the foregoing composed of cotton or other vegetable fiber, except flax, and on manufactures or articles in any form, including such as are commonly known as bias dress facings or skirt bindings, made or cut from plushes, velvets, velveteens, corduroys, or other pile fabrics composed of cotton or other vegetable fiber, 30 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to say anything again upon this bill. I want to make a few observations at this time. I never have taken the cotton-schedule revision seriously——

Mr. GARNER. It is time the gentleman was getting serious.

Mr. MANN. There is no expectation on the part of anybody, I think, except the manufacturers who are scared, that this bill will become a law. It affects southern industries. It will break down the great manufacturing industries in the South. It receives the Democratic support in the House, but it is never expected that it will receive the solid Democratic support at the other end of the Capitol. It takes more than one party at the other end of the Capitol to pass a bill. There is no expectation that this bill will pass the Senate of the United States. It makes not a great deal of difference to me what the cotton-schedule bill is, except as a threat to the industries of the country which holds an uncertainty over the manufacturing establishments, but nothing but the proof at the end can make me believe that the distinguished Senators representing the States of North Carolina and South Carolina and Georgia and the States of the South will not only strike down the industries of their State, but strike down the price of the great crop of the South. It is easy to bring this bill in as a counterpart of the wool bill, which seeks in the main to destroy northern industries. It is offered as a counterpart before the public, but it is a game of buncombe, in my opinion. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn——

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not see the gentleman from Pennsylvania on his feet. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to say a word upon this bill, but it is a duty which I owe to the district which I represent, and also to the State in which that district is located, and also, I believe, it is due to the country as a whole.

A manufacturer of cotton fabrics in my district asked me to keep him advised as to the progress upon this bill. I wrote him a letter, and, by the way, I should not refer to it or his response if it had not been that a letter was read to you by my esteemed friend the Representative from Philadelphia [Mr. DONOHOE].

Now, I will read his response to my letter, as follows:

THE FRANKLIN MILL,
Pittston, Pa., August 3, 1911.

Hon. C. C. BOWMAN, Washington D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In the matter of reduction of duties on cotton goods, beg to advise that we, in common with every factory in the United States, protest against any reduction at this time, and request that you aid us in every way possible.

Even the threatened reduction has caused an entire stoppage of work this summer among the mills in Pennsylvania who consume cotton.

Thanking you in advance for any effort you can make in maintaining the present rates at least, we remain,

Respectfully, yours,

THE FRANKLIN MILL,
W. H. RUTLEDGE, Secretary and Treasurer.

I read the letter which I wrote him in accordance with my promise, as follows:

AUGUST 2, 1911.

Mr. W. H. RUTLEDGE,
Secretary and Treasurer Franklin Mill, Pittston, Pa.

MY DEAR FRIEND: Debate closes to-day on the cotton schedule. There have only been a few days allotted to the subject; not enough time for a tithe of the men who want to speak upon it to be heard. However, there have been some good, strong arguments put up against what I consider an ill-advised change in the law, until we have more information from a Tariff Board as to just how to proceed. It is the general opinion here that if this bill passes the Senate that the President will veto it; however, do not believe it will pass the Senate. The southern Members are beginning to appreciate the effect it will have upon the mills in their section of the country, and yet I understand the change from specific to ad valorem duties has in some instances resulted in giving greater protection on low-grade goods.

Yours, truly,

C. C. B.

Mr. DONOHOE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. BOWMAN. In just one moment. I may add that the gentleman, W. H. Rutledge, is an ex-Representative of the State of Pennsylvania and a Democrat in good standing. I may say further that that mill is supported by stockholders of limited means; that they are dependent—at least some of them—on what they get from that mill for their income. That mill has lately only been working limited time under the present law, owing to the agitation over this measure. I fully and firmly believe there can be no settled conviction and desire by the Members of this House that this bill shall pass, and it was never proposed excepting to make political capital.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I feel that I owe an apology to the House for again trespassing upon its patience, yet I deem myself in a measure justified because of the dangerous character of the precedent sought to be established here through legislation by caucus. We are now to decide this question or the American people are to decide it. If caucus here is to control, then it may control also in the Senate. Therefore, the question is, Shall the legislation of the American Congress be done in secret?

I am just interrupted by a gentleman in front who says that Col. William J. Bryan has asked the same question. I did not know that until this moment.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], my friend, whose ability I admire, made a speech in which he declared that we who criticize the caucus are doing it simply because being in the minority we desire to attack the majority. The gentleman forgets that the gentlemen who are now opposing caucus on this floor opposed it also when they were members of the majority here. And they did it with just as much determination to have the House and the country understand the wrongful character of legislation in secret.

Now, let me give an illustration. It is utterly immaterial as to what may be brought out on this floor by such gentlemen as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], one of the ablest Representatives I have known during my service in the House, one of the highest-minded patriots. [Applause on the Republican side.]

He criticized this bill yesterday, and defied contradiction of a successful character of his assertion that in certain particulars the pending measure increases the tariff above the Payne rates. An attempted contradiction was made, but it was not very successful. But when a man of the character and the learning, and reputation as a statesman, of the gentleman from Massachusetts makes a declaration of that kind it ought to have weight, even with the majority. But did it? Not at all. Legislation in secret is the rule. The caucus had issued its orders, and a defect in the proposition, disclosed in debate on the floor of this Chamber, did not signify. Now, let me give an illustration, which discloses one of the reasons why I have opposed legislation by caucus. I was in a Democratic House when I first came here, the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, Mr. Crisp, being Speaker, one of the most delightful gentlemen I have ever known, and one of the ablest Speakers in the history of the House. I was put on the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

A bill was reported involving 4,000 or 5,000 miles of railroad—the Union Pacific, the Central Pacific, the Kansas Pacific, and the Oregon Extension—and the collection of about $120,000,000 due the Treasury of the United States. In committee we took testimony for the better part of a year—yes; more than a year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not object to the gentleman's request, Mr. Chairman, but I make the motion that all debate on this paragraph end in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that all debate on this paragraph shall close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER. We took testimony up to the last week in January, and Congress was to adjourn on the 4th of March. There was not very much time. Friends of the bill urged that it was very important to the Government that the funding bill should be hurried through, because, as we were informed, the Government would not collect $10,000,000 in 100 years if we did not pass it. I knew that that statement was not true. The committee was composed of 15 members. The majority was Democratic. Eleven members of the committee voted to pass the refunding bill extending those debts for 50 years at 3 per cent. Two Democrats, Boatner and Snodgrass; one Populist, Mr. Harris, of Kansas, afterwards a Senator from that State; and myself were in the minority. I was the only Republican. A rule was brought in limiting the general debate to three hours, to be followed by a five-minute debate of one day, and then a vote on its passage. We made such a protest that the time was extended for one day, and with the facts before a House not gagged by a caucus the bill was defeated.

Now, suppose that a caucus had been called. Unquestionably that caucus would have followed the majority of the Committee on Pacific Railroads, which stood 11 to 4. The caucus, trusting to the judgment of a majority of the committee, would have ordered the bill to be passed. That would have been legislation by caucus, and also legislation by committee. Caucus legislation often is committee legislation. The caucus with practical unanimity would have declared for the extension of that debt for 50 years at 3 per cent interest. But, fortunately, that was before legislation by caucus was customary here. The bill was defeated, and the Government in consequence collected $56,850,000 in cash from the Union Pacific, the Kansas Pacific's debt was cleaned up, and the Central Pacific a year or two later took up a second mortgage, gave the Government a first mortgage, providing for the payment of principal and interest in installments. All has been paid, and approximately $120,000,000 turned into the Treasury of the United States. And yet a caucus, after a hurried debate of two or three hours, would, as I have said, unquestionably and with practical unanimity have indorsed that refunding bill.

Now, then, you can take a good bill into a caucus, but the serious fact is that you can take a bad bill into a caucus and that cunning men can get weak-minded followers to agree to it in a caucus. Under such caucus domination what becomes of the public discussion which is understood to be provided for by the Constitution of the United States? What becomes of the yea-and-nay vote that records, or ought to record, the honest conviction of every legislator in this Chamber?

As I said awhile ago, suppose there were here 95 Republicans and 100 Democrats and 51 of the Democrats believed in a measure and 49 were against it. The 51 would vote the other 49 and your 100 would come in here and defeat 95 Republicans and 49 Democrats. Fifty-one would defeat 135. Legislation in secret is utterly wrong. It is incapable of intelligent defense. Legislation by caucus is very frequently nothing but legislation by a majority of a party, which is a minority compared with the votes which, if untrammeled, would be cast in opposition. It is not American. And, remember, the people of the United States will have this pressed home upon them by men who believe that their oaths to legislate in the interest of the people will not permit them to submit their votes to the domination of a majority in a party caucus held in secret. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this paragraph is exhausted. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

9. On curtains, table covers, and all articles manufactured of cotton chenille, or of which cotton chenille is the component material of chief value, tapestries, and other Jacquard figured upholstery goods, composed wholly or in chief value of cotton or other vegetable fiber; on any of the foregoing, in the piece or otherwise, 35 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I think the greatest exhibition of hypocrisy in the political history of this country has been the performances of the Republican Party during this extra session of Congress. When it was known to them that the Democratic Party would have a majority in this body, they began to prophesy anarchy and disunion. They said the Democratic Party could not march in solid phalanx. They said the Democratic Party had no defined policy or concerted idea of running the Federal Government. All the newspaper organs and leaders of that party every morning before breakfast were gleeful in the prophecy that we would split into factions, and that nothing would be accomplished. Think of the monumental hypocrisy of their leaders in complaining to-day that we yield to and abide by the decision of the caucus. Heretofore they have expressed the hypocritical fear that we would separate into factions. To-day, with the hypocrisy of a Uriah Heep, with dissembling countenances, they say we are standing together and abiding by King Caucus. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This modern party of hypocrisy, no longer to be known in American history as the party of cupidity, but henceforward to go down bearing the semblance of a Uriah Heep—this party of hypocrisy says we ought not to revise the tariff, because, perforce, a Tariff Board of their own hypocritical making in the last Congress has not made its report. In the light of history, what must the verdict be? In 1909 they essayed to frame a tariff bill. No Tariff Board had reported to them. So recently as the beginning of this Congress their President proposed a pact with Canada, and no board had made its report. Now this party of hypocrisy says we are proceeding immaturely, because the Tariff Board have not reported. My Democratic friends, henceforward in your debates about the Republican Party I implore you no longer to refer to it as the party of greed, no longer refer to it as the party of organized wealth in the United States. Tell the people that in all the political history of our country the record of the Republican Party in the Sixty-first Congress is preeminent for supreme and monumental hypocrisy. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

13. On bandings, beltings, bindings, bone casings, cords, garters, ribbons, tire fabric or fabric suitable for use in pneumatic tires, suspenders and braces, tapes, tubing, and webs or webbing, any of the foregoing made of cotton or other vegetable fiber, or of which cotton or other vegetable fiber is the component material of chief value, whether composed in part of india rubber or otherwise, and not embroidered by hand or machinery, spindle banding, woven, braided, or twisted lamp, stove, or candle wicking made of cotton or other vegetable fiber, loom harness, healds, or collets made of cotton or other vegetable fiber, or of which cotton or other vegetable fiber is the component material of chief value, boot, shoe, and corset lacings made of cotton or other vegetable fiber, and labels, for garments or other articles, composed of cotton or other vegetable fiber, 25 per cent ad valorem; on belting for machinery made of cotton or other vegetable fiber and india rubber, or of which cotton or other vegetable fiber is the component material of chief value, 15 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I had reached the conclusion in my own mind that I would vote for this measure, on the theory that I believed that it would furnish cheaper clothing and cheaper products to the masses of the people of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I was extremely gratified when I found that the gentlemen representing the large southern interests were willing to come into the House and reduce, as I understood, the tariff on the products of their own section and their own factories. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But I have been using my pencil for the last 15 or 20 minutes, and, unless I am mistaken in my figures, the bill that the gentleman brings here raises the duty on cheaper articles, which are manufactured largely in the southern mills of this country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I had sincerely hoped that there would be no sectionalism cropping out in this bill. When I came to Congress I hoped that I would have the opportunity of voting for some tariff measures that would do away with some of the inequalities of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill.

My judgment of that measure was that it was unfair—unfair, if you please—to the great agricultural West, of which the State I have the honor in part to represent forms the center. But up to the present time no measure has been proposed or presented by that side of the House that even tended to remove that unfairness, but, on the contrary, every one seemed to me to accentuate it.

In all these measures the gentleman from Alabama has been the presenter, if not the author. At least they have come through a caucus in which the Representatives of the Southern States have held a large and controlling majority. It seems to me in every one of these bills which they have thus far proposed, through their caucus, they have been unfair to the great agricultural West.

They first gave their indorsement to the reciprocity agreement, knowing full well that it put upon the free list all the agricultural products of the great Northwest and did not put upon the free list anything that would come in competition with the agricultural products of the South.

In supporting that measure they seemed to be conscious that Canada did not produce cotton, rice, or cane, and they seemed to be perfectly willing to let the reciprocity agreement go through, as it did not affect them.

The next measure that came along was called the farmers' free-list bill. That, at first flush, was disposed to create the impression that it was for the benefit of the farmers, and was introduced professedly to compensate the farmers for the injustice that had been done them by the reciprocity compact.

But a careful examination of the bill soon revealed the fact that it put on the free list the staple products of the northern farm, mainly cattle, sheep, wheat, meats, and provisions, and opened them up to competition, not merely from Canada, but from the countries of the whole world.

This would force the western farmer to compete in production with the Argentine Republic and the countries of South America, where cattle and sheep are produced at one-half the cost for which they are raised in the United States.

As this was unfair to the great West, I was compelled to vote against the measure.

The next measure presented by that side of the House was known as the wool schedule.

Now, everyone knows that wool is raised in the North. It is not hard to see that such a measure would not have much difficulty in passing a Democratic caucus, a majority of whose members come from a country that neither raises sheep nor manufactures woolen cloth.

I voted against that bill because I believed that it made the tariff on wool too low; that this reduction would cripple the sheep industries; that it would prevent the raising of wool sheep on the high-priced lands in the United States in successful competition with those raised in the Argentine Republic and other southern countries.

Up to the time that the cotton schedule was brought in, I felt that all of the legislation had a sectional bent and a territorial application, and I had begun to think that no measure would be proposed that would affect the industries of the South. I confess I was agreeably surprised when this cotton schedule was presented with the statement that it reduced the general average duty from 48 per cent to 27 per cent. It indeed looked like the majority of the majority was going to be fair.

After listening to the able presentation of the schedule by the distinguished leader of the majority I concluded that I would support that measure.

I had long felt that the masses of the people, and especially the poorer people, were entitled to cheaper clothing and cheaper bedding, and I was more than pleased to give my support to such a measure.

I have always advocated that the tariff ought to be low on the goods used by the poor people and that if we are to have high tariff it should be on articles used by the wealthier classes.

It is not demagogy to say that the burdens of taxation should fall heaviest upon those that are most able to bear them and should fall lightest upon those least able to bear them.

During the discussion of this measure I heard it intimated that there were some schedules in this new bill that by transferring from the specific to the ad valorem duty increased the duty over that in the McKinley, Dingley, or Payne-Aldrich bill.

This statement was so feebly denied on that side of the House that I began to scan the bill, first, to find out if this was true; second, to what class it applied.

Now, I admit that I am a novice in technical tariff schedules, and do not reach conclusions as quickly as some of those experts. Now, my examination shows that it is true, and that the increase is on the low-priced goods.

While I was willing to vote for this measure 30 minutes ago, I am not willing to vote for it now unless some one on that side of the House can explain to me the schedules contained in this bill and the report which indicate to me that this bill raises the duty on cotton goods in all classes of 12 cents a yard or under and lowers the duty above that price.

Now, if that is true, I can not vote for this measure, because it reverses my whole theory of a just tariff law. It has a tendency to increase the price on cheap goods and lower the price on high-priced goods. Now, that is not fair.

If you will turn to the table on page 306 of the report submitted by Mr. UNDERWOOD with this measure you will find under the Payne-Aldrich bill of 1909 this statement:

Cotton cloth, not bleached, dyed, colored, stained, valued at not over 7 cents, duty 1 cent per square yard.

Now, this is the lowest-priced goods contained in the Payne-Aldrich bill, and the duty on it is 1 cent per square yard. If you will turn to page 2, section 3, of the present bill, you will find—

Cotton cloth, not bleached, dyed, colored, stained, 15 per cent ad valorem.

Now, 15 per cent of 7 cents is 1.05; that is to say, the duty on that class of goods under the Underwood bill is increased 5 per cent, taking the Payne-Aldrich bill as a basis.

The next classification is 9 cents and under. In the same report and on the same page, you will find, under the Payne-Aldrich bill—

Cotton cloth, not bleached, etc., valued at not over 9 cents, duty of 1.25 per cent per square yard.

If you will turn to page 2, section 3, of the present bill, you will find—

Cotton cloth, not bleached, etc., 20 per cent ad valorem.

Now, figuring cloth at 9 cents a yard ad valorem, a duty of 20 per cent would be 1.80.

That is to say, while under the McKinley, Dingley, and Payne-Aldrich bills the duty on this class of goods was 1.25, under the present bill it is now 1.80.

If that is not raising the duty, figures lie, and should join the Ananias Club along with the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska.

Again, if you will turn to the same page of the same report, you will find—

Cotton cloth, not bleached, etc., costing more than 9 cents and not over 12 cents a yard, duty of 2 cents a yard.

While there is a slightly different grouping under the present bill, it seems that that class of goods would come under the 25 per cent ad valorem duty in this bill. If it did, and costs 12 cents, the tariff duty would be 3 cents per yard, an increase of exactly 50 per cent over the Payne-Aldrich bill.

But I will be frank and say that in examining this bill somewhat carefully I am inclined to think that some of this third classification in the bill would fall under the second classification in the table, so that the average would probably be about 2½ cents under this bill as against 2 cents under the Payne-Aldrich bill.

Now, if these figures are correct—and I assume they are correct, because they are in the report that bears the signature of the honored leader of that side of the House—it shows that the duty has been raised on the very items that enter into general use by the masses for clothing and bedding, the very items that I think ought to be made cheaper instead of higher. After you pass 12 cents a yard the duty falls very rapidly, and while I have not been able to verify the figures of Mr. UNDERWOOD, I accept them as being substantially correct. If they are correct, there is a large reduction on the schedule as a whole. But it is unfair, gentlemen, to so adjust this tariff that it will lighten the burdens of the wealthy and increase the burdens of the people of moderate circumstances, and unless the gentlemen on that side of the House can explain this matter to my satisfaction I will be compelled to withhold my support of the measure.

Now, everyone knows that it is the cheaper class of goods that is principally manufactured in the southern mills. If my analysis of this bill is correct, you have not only preserved but have increased the protection that the southern cotton mills already have. You have made only the northern mills to feel the sting of foreign competition.

You seem to be perfectly willing to admit of competition in the North, even though it might destroy northern manufacturers, if you can preserve your own industries.

Gentlemen, I do not like this. It is too much like a patriotism that is willing to sacrifice your wife's relation on the field of battle if you can only remain at home and enjoy your comfort.

I once before said upon the floor of this House that "what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander." If the tariff on goods manufactured by northern mills is to be reduced, why should not the class of goods manufactured by the cotton mills of the South be also reduced? Will some gentleman on that side of the House tell me? [Applause on the Republican side.]

If I am not correct, I ask some gentleman on that side of the House to rise and tell me so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The very first item that the gentleman refers to, if he will look at the book of imported mercerized for the year ending June 20, 1909, referring to the first article that he referred to—bleached cloth valued at not more than 7 cents—he will see that the ad valorem rate was 54 per cent.

Mr. PROUTY. What book is the gentleman quoting from?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The imports of merchandise entered for consumption in the United States and duties collected thereon for the years 1909 and 1910.

Mr. MANN. Is that book for the last fiscal year?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will find that it is for the last fiscal year and the items relate to mercerized cotton cloth.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; it is not mercerized. Now, the gentleman from Iowa was mistaken.

Mr. PROUTY. When the gentleman convinces me of it, I will vote with him. I am not caviling. In fact, up to 20 minutes ago I expected to vote for this bill—until I had made these figures. I do not know what the book is the gentleman holds in his hand. I hold in my hand the report of this committee, and as it bears the signature of the distinguished gentleman I assume it is correct.

I am not discussing mercerized cloth. I am discussing cloth of the cheaper varieties, of 12 cents and under, and the figures the gentleman calls my attention to refer to imports on mercerized.

Mr. HILL. If the gentleman from Iowa will turn to page 133 of the report which he has in his hand, he will find that the duty on 9-cent cloth for the last six years has been 10.92, 6.36, 9.13, 7.63, 7.85, and 8.47. That is raised to 15 per cent, and the gentleman from Massachusetts called attention to it in his remarks the other day. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I should like five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. PROUTY. Everybody acquainted with me knows that I am in favor of a reduction on tariff. Everybody knows that I believe that some of the schedules of the present tarff measure are too high. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I confess I was extremely pleased when the gentlemen from the South, after having stricken down everything my section produces and everything in which it is interested, announced their willingness to reduce the tariff on things manufactured in the South.

Their chivalry and fairness challenged my admiration, and when the distinguished gentleman from Alabama made his speech, calling attention to the fact that the South was willing to have its schedules reduced, just like they had reduced the schedules of the products of the North, he captured me, and I made up my mind I would vote for his bill. But when I came to unravel this thing, when I came to dig clear down to the bottom of it, I find that the cotton cloth which the South mostly manufactures not only has all the protection it had under the Payne-Aldrich bill but has more. When I discovered this I felt just a little bit like the fellow who has been buncoed. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

I am quite familiar with the South. I love her and I love her people. Most of my property investments are there. I do not want to hurt her, but she should be fair and wield her sudden power with prudence. I know that the goods manufactured in the southern mills are confined very largely to those described in the three classes to which I have called the attention of the House.

No wonder the distinguished gentleman from Alabama can smile so blandly while the House is putting through this great revision measure. His ox is not gored. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

I have failed so far to be convinced by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama that the report which I hold in my hand and that bears his name is not correct.

I am convinced it is correct and that my analysis of this bill is unanswerable, and that being true I can not give my support to this measure.

The only possible answer that can be made controverting the conclusion drawn from this schedule is suggested by Mr. LENROOT, of Wisconsin. He suggests that while the highest price contained in these classifications—that is to say, 7 cents, 9 cents, and 12 cents—show the results I have arrived at, yet the lower-priced goods in these several classes would cut down the general average to a less figure than that contained in the proposed measure.

I concede that if all of these goods would come in at the very lowest price possible the gentleman is correct. But, applying that test to the second and third cases, to which I have called attention, it is not possible, because even the very lowest figures make a rate as high or higher than the Payne-Aldrich bill.

For instance, take the second class. The next price above 7 cents is 8 cents. Twenty per cent of 8 cents is 1.60, and under the Payne law it is 1.25. Take the third class. Goods which cost 10 cents, and the tariff at 20 per cent would be 2 cents, exactly what it is under the Payne bill. At 11 it would be 2.20 and at 12 it would be 2.40. If the different amounts were equal the average would be 2.20 under this bill as against 2 under the Payne-Aldrich bill.

But we do not need to be guessing about this matter. The Government reports show just what has been imported in these classes of goods. If you will turn to page 130 of the same report, from which I have been quoting, under the heading "Valued at not over 7 cents," and under the column transforming the specific into the ad valorem duty for the last six years, you will find as follows:

	Ad valorem.
1906	10.10
1907	11.75
1908	10.89
1910	16.06

If you will add that up and divide by 6 you will find that the average ad valorem duty on all goods imported into the United States of 7 cents a yard and less during the last six years was 12.52. Under this tariff these goods can not be brought in without paying 15 per cent. If that is not raising the duties, I am wholly unable to understand figures.

If the gentleman will turn to page 133 of the same report, under the table of "Bleached, valued at not more than 9 cents per yard," he will find, in the column in which the Government has transformed the specific into the ad valorem duty, the average was:

	Ad valorem.
1906	7.85
1907	7.63
1908	9.17
1910	10.92

If he will add this up and divide by 6 he will find that the average ad valorem paid on this class of goods for the last six years has been 8.40 per cent. Under the present tariff bill it is made 20 per cent. In other words, the tariff on this class of goods under this new measure is increased practically 250 per cent.

It is not so easy to find the figures exactly corresponding to the third classification, since the designations in the Payne-Aldrich bill and the one contained in this bill do not parallel each other. But as near as I can figure it out from page 134 of the report, the average duty paid on the third class during the last six years was about 19.73 per cent, while the present bill on most of that division charges a duty of 25 per cent.

I can now understand why the gentleman from Alabama smiled so placidly when he was saying that they were reducing the tariff on goods manufactured in the South as well as in the North.

The gentleman from Alabama says that, conceding the accuracy of my figures, they are immaterial; that the amount imported is so small that it cuts no figure.

The gentleman admits that the tariff under the Payne-Aldrich bill on this class of goods is practically prohibitive of importation.

That is to say, the present tariff is so high it affords not merely protection, but is prohibitive of commercial competition; and it seems that he is not satisfied with that.

He wants to raise the tariff wall still higher—so high, if you please, that there will be no danger of any foreign competition.

That is what makes domestic monopoly possible.

That is what makes it possible for the manufacturer to practice extortion.

You talk about this being a revenue measure, and yet, so far as the South is concerned, it is made so high as to absolutely prevent any revenue from being derived from it. As applied to those particular industries in the South, it is the most complete protection that has ever been afforded to any industry. Do I wonder that the gentleman from Alabama placidly smiles while saying that he was reducing the tariff on the goods manufactured in the South as well as in the North?

I say frankly to the gentleman from Alabama that he can not put through his caucus a measure that will materially reduce tariff on the class of goods manufactured by his southern mills. The southern Representatives would vote down such a bill in the caucus. I will be equally frank in saying that he would not have much difficulty in putting through his Democratic caucus, as now constituted, any tariff bill that will injure nothing but the industries of the North.

The gentleman fully understands that of the 227 Democratic Members in this House 124 come from the South, that they constitute the majority of the Democratic caucus, and that any measure that the South favors can be put through that caucus and any measure that the South disapproves can not be put through.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] upbraids me for intimating that this is a sectional measure.

Well, I have only given the facts. To say the least, it is a strange coincidence that under the Underwood bill the tariff should be raised on the goods that are principally manufactured in the South and is lowered on the goods manufactured almost exclusively in the North.

Gentlemen, you must present a fairer measure than this before I can support it. You must leave out your sectional "jokers." We have had too many of them already. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Iowa in discussing this proposition before the committee, which the House has been discussing for the last five days, in five minutes convinces himself that he is wrong by figuring these rates with his pencil. I will say, to be perfectly candid with the gentleman, that as to the goods covered by this first paragraph of 15 per cent that he states relates to the low class of goods, a large part of them are made in the South. Some of them are made in the North:

On cotton cloth, not bleached, dyed, colored, stained, painted, printed, or mercerized, containing yarn the highest number of which shall not exceed No. 50, 15 per cent ad valorem.

That includes yarns up to the point in the Payne bill where there are 150 threads to the square inch. Up to that point in the Payne bill comes in that classification. I think there is one item of cloth as shown by these reports that is below that 15 per cent, and but one.

Mr. McCALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was trying to convince the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY]. He wanted information, but I see he is not listening.

Mr. McCALL. I will permit the gentleman to convince the gentleman from Iowa, but I understood the gentleman from Alabama to say there was only one item of increase. I want to call his attention to a very important item in which the increase is 100 per cent, and there is no possible answer to it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I, of course, admit, Mr. Chairman, that when you adopt an ad valorem system you have to take the average. Gentlemen on that side of the House would condemn us the more if in fixing an ad valorem rate we went to the bottom basis and the cheapest rate in anything to fix our entire classification. I said to the gentleman from Massachusetts the other day, and I say to him again, that if he will average this pending bill on all articles under 150 threads to the square inch, which come within this classification, he will find that we are from 15 to 20 per cent below the taxes levied in the Payne-Aldrich bill.

Mr. McCALL. Will the gentleman yield right on that point?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. McCALL. I will call the gentleman's attention to page 133 of his report. First I would ask him what the lowest rate in his bill is upon bleached cotton cloth?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is 15 per cent on unbleached cotton cloth.

Mr. McCALL. On bleached cotton cloth the lowest rate is 20 per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. McCALL. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the figures on the bottom of page 133, that show that for the last six years the average rate of duty upon bleached cotton cloth, 9 cents or under in value, is only 8.40 per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. McCALL. While in the gentleman's bill it is 20.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is 10.92.

Mr. McCALL. What is the average for the last six years? The gentleman speaks of averages, and I would ask him to state what the average has been for the last six years upon bleached cotton cloth valued at 9 cents or under?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman wants averages, why does he not average back 10 years, and then he will raise it above 20 per cent?

Mr. McCALL. I will average for the gentleman, and I will say that the increase of his bill on bleached cotton cloth under 9 cents a yard is 250 per cent over the average duty for the last six years. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KENDALL. Are not these goods made in the South?

Mr. McCALL. Of course, we know they are made chiefly in the South.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I am not surprised at the gentleman from Iowa, but for my friend from Massachusetts to make the insinuation that this class of goods is made chiefly in the South, when in his own district, or close to his own district, a large portion of them are made.

Mr. McCALL. There is no cotton mill in my district.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not mean in your district proper, but close to your district. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take a great deal of time on this proposition——

Mr. KENDALL. Go on.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield when I get through making my statement, if the gentleman will wait.

Mr. KENDALL. It is related to this table on page 133.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that I am trying to answer a statement of his colleague from Iowa. I can not answer both gentlemen from Iowa at the same time.

Mr. KENDALL. All right.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, on cotton cloth not exceeding 100 threads a square inch, bleached, and not exceeding 9 square yards to the pound, the average ad valorem duty for 1910 was 27 per cent. We make it 20 per cent. On the next page, in the same classification—it is page 134 I am reading from—now on page 135 of the report, valued not over 9 cents per square yard for 1910, the cloth bears an average rate of duty of 35 per cent. The next paragraph, valued at over 9 cents per square yard, same classification for 1910, it is 25 per cent. On cotton cloth not exceeding 100 threads to the square inch, dyed, colored, stained, or printed, not exceeding 6 yards to the pound, on page 137, it is 29.83. The same classification, on page 138, falling in the same paragraph, exceeding 6 and not exceeding 9 square yards to the pound, the rate under the Payne bill for 1910 was 40.93. Right underneath, exceeding 9 yards to the pound, for 1910 the rate was 33.21, and so on through. Now, to say that when we fixed the classification embracing all of these every article under 150 threads to the square inch as covered in the Payne bill and under No. 50 as carried by our bill—because they are synonymous terms—when you find one item, or maybe two items, as my distinguished friend from Massachusetts has been able to find, and when you find a large amount of importations here coming in at 33, 35, and 40 per cent, then to make such a charge as this shows that the gentlemen on that side are not willing to face this bill on its merits, but are trying to appeal to the prejudice of sections. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, "the chickens have come home to roost." For two years the American people have been dealing with averages on the Payne bill. Instead of specifically naming certain items which they criticized, our Democratic friends have been condemning the Payne bill on general averages of schedules, when they know that if like criticisms, which are now being made of this measure, had been fairly considered with reference to the other, the country would have approved the Payne bill as a whole instead of condemning it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, just a moment ago we had a speech from a gentleman from Alabama, not the leader of the majority, but his colleague, in which he said:

Under the splendid leadership of the gentleman from Alabama.

And I stand here with him acknowledging that splendid leadership, so far as the making of an absolute revenue tariff bill without a particle of protection in it is concerned.

But I call his attention to the fact that I remember another scene only a few months ago when the "splendid leadership" of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the splendid leadership of the Speaker of this House was turned down by the same radical element in the Democratic Party that is now making a tariff for revenue only. I remember when every man on the Ways and Means Committee of his own volition, without pressure, absolutely approved in eight minutes the organization of a Tariff Board, and every man of them made a speech in favor of it on this floor. And the same radical element that is now in control turned them down by the overwhelming majority of 93 to 33 on the Democratic side.

I remember more than that—and it comes in very bad faith now, when it is discovered that a southern product is increased 150, yes 250, per cent, when the gentleman who now admits it in a single instance then said on the floor of the House:

My friend from Tennessee wants to know why we should want information in reference to a bill written for revenue and revenue only. Why, my friend, of all the bills—of all the bills that require information the man who is writing a tariff bill for revenue only needs information most.

And this comes from the present Democratic leadership—

That is what the gentleman said.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Was that speech made on the occasion of discussion of the Tariff Board in the House?

Mr. HILL. It absolutely was made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who now admits his mistake, and I commend——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow me to answer him?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. "The gentleman from Alabama" stated on the floor last winter that he desired the information, and would like to have a Tariff Board that would furnish information, but since that time "the gentleman from Alabama" has discovered that the board will not furnish it.

Mr. HILL. At that time the gentleman's party was in the minority, and now it is in the majority, and they absolutely ignore the declaration made by themselves six months ago, just as I think the people of the United States will ignore them when they have put this reduction into effect. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I will.

Mr. BUTLER. I know the gentleman is an expert in this matter, and I want to know whether I shall vote for this bill. If it raises duties, I am ready to vote for it.

Mr. HILL. Are you asking "the gentleman from Connecticut" or the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman from Connecticut. Does the gentleman know why this one particular item in this bill should be raised?

Mr. HILL. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania wants to see the Democratic side of the House half vacated and then filled by Republicans two years hence, he will vote for this bill and let it be in operation until the next election. If he wants to see the industries of this country cared for and preserved, he will vote against it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman let me ask him another question? Could this bill have been made and its symmetry preserved by lowering the duty upon bleached cotton cloth? Will the gentleman answer me that question?

Mr. HILL. No trouble about it whatever.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, the charge is now made against our committee that under the guise of fairness we have brought in a bill which in reality favors the southern cotton manufacturers and cuts more deeply into the rates of the northern cotton manufacturers. As a member of the committee I utterly repudiate that charge.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. McCALL. I do not wish to ask a question. I simply wish to disavow making any charge affecting the motives of the committee. I simply say that it is a coincidence, however, that goods produced in certain parts of the country have the duty increased by this bill some 250 per cent.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman can name only one item of that kind of goods. The gentleman from Massachusetts does not impugn our motives, as he is too fair a man. But other Members on that side have impugned our motives. I am not a southern man, but I am a member of that committee, and I sat there all through the deliberations, and I absolutely repudiate the insinuations that any sectionalism or favor has been shown in the composition of this bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It struck me with extreme surprise that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], who have served on the Committee on Ways and Means for years and have been through a recent tariff revision themselves, should descend to such picayune and contemptible arguments as these. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When you are making up a tariff bill affecting a great industry in this country, you are dealing with matters that involve the importation of goods upon which millions of dollars of revenue are levied, and yet if you examine the committee report, which embodies the returns of the Treasury Department for years past on these matters—if you will examine the point on which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] and other Republicans have based their arguments—you will find that the importations of this cheap kind of common cloth, upon which they say we have raised the duty, amounted to only $2.50 or $4.50 or $121—a ridiculous sum for serious members of the Ways and Means Committee to use as an argument upon which to base the charge of sectionalism.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the fact is that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to select any ad valorem rates covering a whole class of cotton goods of this sort which as to certain cheaper grades would not be prohibitive. These importations are only fanciful, freak things, little bits of matters involving only a few dollars or a few cents. It is upon the big classes of importations, involving millions of dollars, that we have reduced the rates of taxation from 56 per cent down to 27 per cent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McCALL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. McCALL. I understood the gentleman to say——

Mr. KENDALL. I appealed to the gentleman because I recognized him as an authority on the subject. Has there been an increase in the rates in any part of this schedule?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. There has been an apparent increase.

Mr. KENDALL. I mean a genuine increase.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. An increase upon goods of a certain kind upon which there is no importation at all. Does the gentleman know that we are selling abroad $41,000,000 worth of this cheap product? And if we can do that, how can you expect foreigners to ship goods of that same class over here and sell them in our market? The whole argument is ridiculous and unworthy the consideration of serious men.

Mr. KENDALL. If that is true, why was there an increase made in the rate?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Because you can not select an ad valorem rate in figuring upon these apparent importations without making a rate that may be prohibitive in a certain class of goods.

Mr. KENDALL. Why was a southern product the chief one selected as the subject of an increase?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. It was not selected. It is in the reclassification that the apparent increase comes.

Mr. KENDALL. Is it an actual increase in a broad provision of the tariff to which the gentleman is referring?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Not at all. It is an enormous decrease in every effective rate in every paragraph of the bill.

Mr. KENDALL. Is it only an apparent increase?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire how long gentlemen on that side expect to run the debate? When is a vote expected? If it is the intention to vote to-night, the gentlemen should realize that there can not be much more debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that we expect to have a vote to-night, even if we have to stay here late.

Mr. MANN. I do not say that because I want to cut off debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not want to limit the debate unduly, Mr. Chairman, but I hope that gentlemen will confine themselves strictly to the bill from now on, without too much latitude of debate.

Mr. KENDALL. Why not continue the debate on the bill to-morrow?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We can not pass this bill on Friday.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] is now recognized to propound an inquiry to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. McCALL. The gentleman from New York admits that this bill increases the duties of the Payne bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, just a moment——

Mr. McCALL (continuing). He says that the duties have been increased.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Was objection made to the request that the time of my colleague [Mr. HARRISON] be extended?

Mr. McCALL. No.

The CHAIRMAN. There was no objection. The gentleman from Illinois reserved the right to object, but did not make the objection. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] took his seat, and then the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] was recognized. That is the parliamentary situation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the Chair never stated whether objection was made to the request.

The CHAIRMAN. There was no objection made. The gentleman from Illinois reserved the right to object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the Chair made no statement. He merely stated that the gentleman had reserved the right to object.

Mr. McCALL. I wish it distinctly understood that I want the gentleman from New York to have his five minutes, and I have no desire to take him from the floor.

Mr. MANN. I ask the gentleman from Alabama to ask unanimous consent to close all debate on this paragraph in 10 minutes.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. There are other paragraphs following this.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Gentlemen are attacking the paragraph in the bill, and although I am anxious to get along, I want them to have full opportunity to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] proceed for five minutes, the request being made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to detain the committee with this argument any longer. I was about to take my seat when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] did me the courtesy of asking for an extension of time, and I have now taken the floor again for the purpose of answering a question by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY], but if he will give me a moment before he asks his question, I think perhaps I can clear up some misapprehension which seems to exist on the other side of the Hall. Gentlemen over there seem to believe, or else they insinuate, that certain articles were picked out for an apparent raise in rate, and that these are articles which are made in the South.

The cheaper grades of cotton goods are made in the South. They are made in the North also, but they are the goods that we ship into all the markets of the world; and any tariff rate which could be fixed to catch only those goods and none of those of a little higher class, which do come in in some quantity, would have the apparent effect of raising rates on the lower grades of goods. But if those goods are not imported, never have been imported, never will be imported, and never can be imported, the raise is only apparent and not real, and should not be the basis for serious, sincere, straight-forward Members of this House to frame an attack against the Democratic Party.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. PROUTY. On page 306 of this report, under the heading "cotton cloth," are the words "not bleached, dyed, colored, stained, 1 cent per square yard."

That is under the Payne bill. Now, let me ask the gentleman what will be the rate under this bill?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Now, the gentleman seems to have greatly confused the purpose of the table from which he is quoting. These are the rates of all preceding tariff laws for years back. If he will turn to the earlier pages in the committee report he will not have to ask me my opinion of what the rates are or sit down and work out his opinion. He will find the committee has reported exactly what the rates have been in practice.

Mr. PROUTY. As we lawyers say, please answer my question: What is the duty on that class of goods?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. If the gentleman proposes to try to stop me with a proposition in arithmetic, I decline to fall into his trap. He can turn to the correct page of the committee report and find an answer to his question.

Mr. PROUTY. It is 15 per cent, is it not?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. It is 15 per cent in our bill.

Mr. PROUTY. And 15 per cent of 7 is 1.05.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. If the gentleman will turn to the page in the committee report, he will find exactly what it is.

Mr. PROUTY. Now, on bleached cloth not exceeding 9 cents in value a yard, under the Payne bill the duty is 1¼ cents, and what is it under this bill?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Twenty per cent.

Mr. PROUTY. And 20 per cent of 9 is 1.80, as against 1.25 in the Payne bill.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes; one and eight-tenths.

Mr. PROUTY. Let me ask you the third question. Coming down to the same class of goods, valued at over 12 cents, the rate under the Payne bill is 2 cents a yard. What would it be under this bill?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, this seems to be exactly the same series of questions that the gentleman asked the gentleman from Alabama. I have devoted seven or eight minutes, and the committee has given up its valuable time to listening to a complete answer to all these questions.

Mr. PROUTY. As chairman of the committee, will the gentleman answer?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The gentleman flatters me too much; I am only an humble member of the committee. The reason why the gentleman's arithmetic is of no account is because there are no importations under this rate.

Mr. PROUTY. Then, why do you increase them? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Because, fixing any ad valorem rate in a reclassification you can not select any rate, even 1 per cent, that would not be prohibitive.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman state that under the ad valorem system, which now seems to be the policy of your party, it would not be possible to put bleached cotton cloth, valued at less than 9 cents a yard, at a different rate from bleached cotton cloth?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. It would not be impossible, but it would be ridiculous, because there is none imported, and the gentleman knows it as well as I do.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much to have disturbed the serenity of my friend from New York by simply referring to some incontestible rates that were named in his bill. He thought that was a very disreputable retort, a very disreputable kind of an argument for a gentleman to use. [Laughter on the Republican side.] He proceeded to say that they had increased certain rates, but those rates were all prohibitive. That is the only excuse and the only thing that could be construed to be the reason that he has seen fit to give to the House. [Applause on the Republican side.] As the gentleman himself told us during the Payne debate, it does not so much depend on what the amount of importations is as it does on the amount of domestic consumption. I submit that the rates upon which this bill gives great and substantial increases are upon those cloths that are mainly used by the poor people of the country and I stated simply as a coincidence, and not reflecting upon the motives of gentlemen on the other side, that these are the products of the South. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCALL. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Does not the gentleman believe that a rate of 1 mill, or one-tenth of 1 per cent ad valorem, would be practically prohibitive as to the class of goods where we ship $40,000,000 annually abroad?

Mr. McCALL. If I had a rate of 1 mill and that was prohibitive on an article of necessary consumption in this country, I should not increase that rate. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] Now, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has not done himself justice in the way in which he attempted to make the point that has been made. He attempted to carry the computation up into high numbers, and even got into mercerized cloths.

The working people of this country do not use mercerized goods for their sheets and their shirtings and for the many uses to which cotton cloth is put by them. I understand that those three paragraphs—to wit, the unbleached cloths not containing more than 50 threads to the inch and not of a value of more than 7 cents per yard, unbleached cloths of a value of not more than 9 cents, and cloths which are bleached, printed, and stained of a value of not more than 12 cents—form a great part of the consumption of the American working people. [Applause on the Republican side.] I assert, and it can not be contradicted, that upon nearly all those grades of goods this bill makes increases. Upon a very few of them it makes very slight decreases, but upon the great bulk of those goods it makes increases, and upon some of them it makes increases to the amount of nearly 250 per cent of the Payne and Dingley tariffs. [Applause on the Republican side.]

You take painted and dyed and bleached cloths of a value of 12 cents a yard, and that means a foreign value of 12 cents a yard. Then you add to that the duty of 2 cents under the Payne bill and that makes the goods after they have been entered at the New York customhouse 14 cents a yard after duty is paid at the customhouse. When you take into account the expense of the jobber and the profit of the wholesaler and the retailer those goods would not go to the people for less than 20 cents a yard, and probably would go to them for 25 cents a yard. It is the rare exception for any man who works for wages in this country to buy cotton goods that costs over 25 cents a yard. When gentlemen on the other side of the House bring in this magnificent measure for the relief of the American people, they are imposing still heavier burdens upon the backs of the American workingmen, and they are giving the relief to the rich people of the country who should pay the high revenue tax upon these luxurious cotton fabrics which rank by the side of silk. [Applause on the Republican side.] I say that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY], in his research to-day, has got upon the vital question at issue in this bill, and if the Members on the other side of the House had not forestalled themselves by caucus action, had not taken merely ex parte statements before they committed themselves to vote for this measure, I believe this bill would not command the majority of the votes of the members of the House of Representatives. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat surprised at the situation in which we seem to find ourselves at the present time. Certain gentlemen seem to think that a great discovery has been made, that a great mare's-nest has been uncovered with reference to this bill. I had supposed that what has been disclosed during the last hour was familiar to every student of this bill, and yesterday, in discussing this bill upon the floor, I stated that I would not attempt to sustain every item in it, and I certainly hold no commission to attempt to sustain the Committee on Ways and Means upon every item in this bill. But, Mr. Chairman, fairness ought to characterize our conduct in the consideration of a measure of this kind. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I realize that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY], in raising the question that he has, has been entirely honest in asking for information, and I am sorry that it has not been made as clear up to this time as I think it can be, and I shall only speak of the two items to which he has called the attention of the committee.

Mr. PROUTY. Three items.

Mr. LENROOT. Three. The first item is cotton cloth not exceeding 50 threads, not bleached, valued at not more than 7 cents a yard. The gentleman from Iowa thinks that, comparing the rate found in the pending bill and the rate imposed under the present law as to this item, this bill creates an increase. Mr. Chairman, it is not so. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The present bill, so far as this item is concerned, decreases the tariff, and I think I can demonstrate it to every Member of this House.

This item relates to all cloth not exceeding 50 threads to the inch and valued at not over 7 cents per square yard, and that means that it relates to all cloths in that classification valued at less than 7 cents per square yard. Now, it is true, as the gentleman says, that when you come to the very maximum—7 cents per square yard—it is 1.05 cents a yard as against 1 cent under the present law. That is an increase as to that 7-cent cotton——

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman permit an interruption? If the gentleman will refer to page 133, which gives the import duties——

Mr. LENROOT. I am coming to that a little later.

Mr. HILL. And it shows an increase of 250 per cent——

Mr. LENROOT. I will get to that, if I have the time, a little later. I am discussing now not the matter of importations, but exactly what the bill upon its face does, and let me repeat: As to the 7-cent cotton, it is 1.05 cents, five one-hundredths of a cent greater than the present law; but I want to ask the gentleman from Iowa to take cotton cloth valued at 4 cents a yard. The duty under the present law will still be 1 cent a yard, and that is 25 per cent ad valorem as against 15 per cent in the present bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Cloth valued at 5 cents per yard still comes in under that item. That is 20 per cent ad valorem as against 15 per cent ad valorem in the present bill. Cloth valued at 6 cents per square yard still comes in under that same item, and the duty there is 0.9 cent a yard under this bill as against 1 cent under the present act. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, in all fairness, will any gentleman—will the gentleman from Massachusetts, if you choose—undertake to say upon this floor that that item increases the rate over that class of lower-grade cotton? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, the gentleman referred to importations. It is true that if you turn to page 133 of the report the average percentage that is upon the higher values after the——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. I will just ask for two minutes additional.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, the gentleman speaks of importations. It is true that the average is lower than this, but it is because we had in the law a specific rate and all importations that came in under that item are at the highest rate and so all importations are on the one class, as in the case of this item I speak of, 7-cent goods, because whenever you get cotton valued at less than that the rate in the present law is prohibitive and there are no importations. Mr. Chairman, there can not be any question in my mind as to the correctness of that. Now, it is true as to one item here, of bleached cloth not exceeding 50 threads and valued at over 9 cents per square yard, that as to a portion of that there is an increase over the present law, but that is as between 7 cents and 9 cents, that narrow margin, that imposing a duty of 25 per cent ad valorem increases it, provided it is not mercerized, but I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to the fact that whenever this cloth is mercerized, and a very large portion of it is mercerized, that the duty under this law instead of being 1¼ cents per square yard, is 2½ cents per square yard, and as to every yard of cloth that is mercerized the ad valorem in this pending bill is lower than the rate imposed by the present law. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PROUTY. What does the gentleman say as to the cost between the price of 9 and 12 cents per yard? Does it increase or decrease?

Mr. LENROOT. I have not looked at that. Now, what is your question?

Mr. PROUTY. Does the Underwood bill increase or decrease the tariff on goods that are over 9 cents and less than 12?

Mr. LENROOT. Just give me the rate.

Mr. PROUTY. Under the present bill it is 20 per cent, which would be 2.4, and under the Payne bill it is 2.

Mr. LENROOT. Between 7 and 9?

Mr. PROUTY. Between 9 and 12.

Mr. LENROOT. I will be very glad to answer the question. As to some portion of it it will be under.

Mr. PROUTY. I am not speaking of mercerized.

Mr. LENROOT. If it is 9, it is less.

Mr. PROUTY. Have you any means of knowing whether the average will be more or less? I assume it might be less.

Mr. LENROOT. As to that item, I am frank to say I do not know. As to mercerized, it is less. Concerning which this contention has been made, the first point which the gentleman from Iowa made, the pending bill is very clearly a reduction from the present law.

Mr. PROUTY. I made the point on the whole three items.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to ask the gentleman from Iowa to turn to page 139 and see the report of cloth not exceeding 100 threads to the square inch. The gentleman asks about cloth within this classification valued over 12 cents per square yard.

Mr. PROUTY. Under 12 cents a square yard.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What I had here was over 12 cents a square yard.

Mr. PROUTY. That is where the line is, if I catch it correctly, at that point.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It would be 30 cents ad valorem as shown by the Treasury report. Valued at not over 12 cents per square yard—if you will look on page 137—not exceeding 50 threads to the square inch, 21 per cent; not exceeding 6 square yards to the pound—another classification—29 per cent; exceeding 6 and not exceeding 9 square yards to the pound, 40 per cent; exceeding 9 square yards to the pound—that same valuation—33 per cent. So the gentleman can readily see, as I stated to the gentleman from Massachusetts several days ago and also to-day, that the average of this classification that he complains about is way below the rates in the Payne bill. The gentleman has but one item of this classification that he points to as lower, and the importations under that item amounted to $1,040.

Mr. PAYNE. How much was the consumption?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have not the figures as to the consumption. I have no doubt that like all the other items in this bill this item was largely prohibitive, and the imports did not fairly represent the consumption, but there is one thing sure, that if you leave the Payne bill on the statute books you only prevent the American people from the use of $1,040 worth of goods, if this is an increase in this rate. One thousand and forty dollars is all that is involved on a schedule that covers over $7,000,000 of consumption.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman says that if you leave the Payne bill on the statute books you only prevent them from having the use of $1,000 worth?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I mean as to consumption.

Mr. HILL. As to his own argument as made of the value, does not he increase the value of the whole domestic production precisely according to the amount he increases the tariff?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I agree with the gentleman thoroughly, but he was not so candid with me the other day as to agree with me.

Mr. HILL. I did not agree with you on your own argument.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I admit it increases the price, but I say there is just one item. When we made a general classification we had to embrace all between two lines, the top and the bottom, for an ad valorem rate between the high point and the low point, and cover this classification, and of necessity we could not write a fair rate by taking the lowest rate on the lowest classification.

We are writing this bill for revenue, but the gentlemen have been unable to find more than one single item in this classification that is below the rate we have fixed, amounting to only $1,040, and, on the average, the classification of this lower class of goods is a reduction of between 15 and 20 per cent below the rates of the Payne bill. I challenge any gentleman on that side to show otherwise.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama to Table No. 40, on page 137, to which he referred a moment ago. I understood the gentleman to say that there was only one item among all those that the gentleman from Iowa had referred to where the rate of duty was raised. The gentleman referred to Table No. 40. He said that under Table No. 40 the rate was 31.31 per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is right.

Mr. MANN. That is correct for the year 1910, but for the year 1905 the average ad valorem rate on the same class of goods was 13.41, which shows that some of the goods pay a higher rate than 15 and 20 per cent, and some of the goods pay a lower rate. Is not that perfectly evident?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No. The gentleman understands that 1910 is under the Payne bill and 1905 was under the Dingley bill.

Mr. MANN. Oh, there is no difference in the rates between the two bills, I believe.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I agree with the gentleman in this—that the change of the unit value of the goods changes the rate. But in the same way, if the gentleman wants to make that argument——

Mr. MANN. No; I was trying to get a result here that would settle this question. I asked the question, and I want to see if we can have an understanding about it. The gentleman said there was only one item. I wish the gentleman to retract the statement that there is only one item, and show, in order that we can have the matter settled, that in some of the ad valorem rates there would be an increase. But generally he is correct in his opinion; there is undoubtedly a decrease in the rate. I would be glad if we could get through talking about it and then go ahead and pass the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman that in my remarks I was, of course, referring to the tax under the Payne bill—the tax in 1910—and the item that the gentleman points out as being a lower item than in 1910 was 20 per cent.

Mr. MANN. The same identical rate was in existence in 1909, when the ad valorem rate was 13.41 per cent, which proves that some rates were less than 15 per cent on some goods, and some were higher, depending upon the price. The ad valorem rate, of course, constantly varies under a specific duty.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Unquestionably; I do not deny that. But my statement was that last year there was one of these items that was higher. If you take the same item that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] referred to awhile ago, and go back a few years, you will see that it ran up to 23 and 24 per cent. I agree with the gentleman, and we make no contention about it that there are a few of these items in this lower classification that may be a little higher. But the general average of this class of goods is over 15 per cent below what it is in the Payne bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I did not hear the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], in which he denied the accuracy of my statement, but the matter has been called to my attention, and I simply want to put in the RECORD, from page 130 of the preliminary paper or report issued by the committee, the first table, to show that on all goods of that first classification, not exceeding 7 cents in value, the average rate of duty on all goods brought in at the 1-cent rate, which has been in force since the Dingley bill went into effect, has been 12.52 per cent for the past six years, and under this bill it is 15 per cent. So, when gentlemen talk of averages and accuse one of misrepresentation by taking a simple number, I want to call attention to the general average under that classification.

Then, on page 133, at the bottom of the page, bleached goods, valued not over 9 cents per square yard, not exceeding 50 threads to the square inch, which was the second classification to which I called attention, to show that my observation did not simply apply to the goods valued at 9 cents under that classification, you will see that the average rate upon importations in the last six years is 8.41 per cent.

Under the present bill the rate under that classification would be 20 per cent, which is about 250 per cent of the rate in the Dingley and Payne bills. These figures, I think, can not be denied.

Mr. LENROOT. Has the gentleman any information as to the value per square yard of those importations?

Mr. McCALL. In the one case the classification is of bleached goods valued at not over 9 cents per square yard, and in the other case valued at not over 7 cents per square yard; and they would include in each case any of these goods of which gentlemen have spoken. I do not know whether the gentleman from Wisconsin spoke of them or not, where the value was only 4 cents a yard.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In the column just before the one the gentleman is reading it gives the average value per square yard of these importations, which shows that it was less than 9 cents.

Mr. McCALL. Yes; the gentleman can easily figure that up, and he can find the average value if he will indulge in a mathematical calculation; but in view of the method of argument that has been adopted against the Payne bill, in selecting a certain rate and then taking a quarter of a cent above that rate, at which importers never would bring in goods, in order to distort the Payne rate and make it as high as possible, which is a familiar argument that has been used against the Payne bill on the other side of the House, I was entirely justified in planting myself simply upon the 7, 9, and 12 cent rates. But what I have said is correct as to the averages of all importations under the classification of 7 cents and of 9 cents.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McCALL. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. The ad valorem percentage rate stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts includes the rate on the lower valued goods as well as upon the higher values, does it not?

Mr. McCALL. It includes all kinds, up to 7 cents in value per yard, to which that paragraph was applicable.

Mr. MADDEN. So that the average of 8 per cent and some fraction ad valorem covers the ad valorem rate on the 4 cents, 5 cents, 6 cents, 7 cents, 8 cents, and 9 cents?

Mr. McCALL. Why, it took the average at the customhouse of all goods.

Mr. MADDEN. The argument has been made here that it did not include the lower rates.

Mr. McCALL. If the gentleman will study the report he will see the fallacy of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House without amendment, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CULLOP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12812) to reduce the duties on the manufactures of cotton, and had directed him to report the bill back to the House without amendment, with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to its final passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the motion which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PAYNE moves to recommit the bill H. R. 12812 to the Committee on Ways and Means, with instructions to that committee to hold the bill in committee until the Tariff Board makes report to Congress of the information secured by the special and complete investigation now being made by said Tariff Board in regard to the production, manufacture, use, and consumption of cotton goods, and especially covering every element of the cost of production, and to report said bill back to the House with such provisions and amendments as it may deem proper after examination and consideration of the information so reported by the Tariff Board.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. GARRETT. That the gentleman does not present a motion to recommit under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is overruled. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to recommit.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 106, nays 186, answered "present" 6, not voting 87, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. McHENRY (for the bill) with Mr. SWITZER (against).

Mr. ELLERBE with Mr. McKENZIE.

Mr. DIFENDERFER (for the bill) with Mr. NEEDHAM (against).

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania (for the bill) with Mr. PLUMLEY (against).

Until Friday:

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania (for the bill) with Mr. LANGHAM (against).

Until further notice:

Mr. HOBSON with Mr. BATES.

Mr. PALMER (for the bill) with Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma (against).

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the last vote and to lay that motion on the table.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, on the roll call to recommit I voted "present," being paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. GARDNER. I understand that the roll does not show my having voted "present." I did vote "present," and desire the RECORD to so state.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will make the change.

FREE-LIST BILL.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements and other articles, and to consider the bill and Senate amendments in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 4413, with Senate amendments, and to consider the bill and amendments in the House as in Committee of the Whole. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama, being late in the evening now, whether it is his intention to ask a disagreement to the Senate amendments and send the bill to conference, or endeavor to dispose of each amendment upon its merits this afternoon?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I propose to move to concur in Senate amendment No. 8, relating to Portland cement and other articles, with an amendment, and to move to disagree to the other amendments and send the bill to conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Clerk to report the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments.

Senate amendments Nos. 1 to 7, inclusive, were read.

Senate amendment No. 8 was read, as follows:

Amendment No. 8, page 3, after line 16, insert, "Roman, Portland, and other hydraulic cement, and lime."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to disagree to Senate amendments Nos. 1 to 7, inclusive.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves to disagree to Senate amendments 1 to 7, inclusive.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I want to offer a motion as a substitute, which I think is privileged, that we concur in all the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho makes a preferential motion that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to concur in one amendment with an amendment, and I believe that is preferential at this stage. Does the gentleman from Idaho mean the first seven amendments?

Mr. FRENCH. My motion was intended to apply to all the amendments. However, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], I make the motion to the first seven amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] moves to concur in the first seven amendments. That is a preferential motion, and the vote is on that motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. That is equivalent to nonconcurrence in the Senate amendments.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I now move to concur in amendment No. 8 with an amendment, by striking out the period and adding after the last word the words "and lemons."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves to concur in the Senate amendment No. 8 with an amendment by striking out the period and adding the words "and lemons."

Mr. STEPHENS of California. Mr. Speaker, under the parliamentary rules have I a right to be heard at this time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has the floor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman. I understand the bill is being considered under the five-minute rule in the House as in the Committee of the Whole, and I will yield to the gentleman from California first.

Mr. STEPHENS of California. Mr. Speaker, I am very much interested in lemons, but I am not here asking for a duty on them that is not right. I have stood here on this floor voting my sentiments upon the tariff question, and I ask that lemons be given proper consideration by the Committee on Ways and Means and by this House. We have had no notice whatever on this question; we are not prepared to advance our arguments now, and this seems to be taking snap judgment on an important proposition.

Gentlemen, the lemon industry of California and Florida has sent its experts into Italy and along the Mediterranean shores to investigate this question, and they are prepared, or will be prepared, they say, to present the result of their investigation to the committee for full discussion and consideration. When they do so, whatever the determination, whatever the right figures may be, I will be willing to stand for, but I am not ready to stand for a snap judgment. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I protest against the amendment being considered now, and I ask that this part of the amendment be not adopted now.

Mr. COLLIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of California. I will.

Mr. COLLIER. The gentleman has probably made a deep study of this question, and I would like to ask him, for information, if the lemon crop of California and Florida is sufficient to supply the demand in the United States?

Mr. STEPHENS of California. Mr. Speaker, I will answer the gentleman's question by saying that there are not enough lemons produced in the United States to-day to supply the demand, but with the proper amount of tariff on lemons there will be sufficient raised gradually to supply the demand.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the amendment offered to the amendment is not in order at this time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is too late, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The point of order comes too late.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to place lemons on the free list. The raise in the rates on lemons was one of the most indefensible raises in the Payne-Aldrich tariff law. The rate before that law had been 1 cent a pound. In the House bill it was raised to 1¼ cents a pound, and in the Senate to 1½ cents a pound, which rate became the law. The former rate had been 53 per cent ad valorem, and the rate of 1½ cents a pound, 78 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. LENROOT. If the gentleman is correct about this rate being so outrageous, I should like to ask him why his committee did not include lemons in the original free-list bill?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I will say to the gentleman frankly that I think it was an oversight. It should have gone into the original bill, and I am glad of this opportunity to repair that oversight and to offer the amendment in the House now. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Opposition to the adoption of an amendment of this kind——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I do.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to ask a question for information. The gentleman from Alabama moves to concur in the amendment of the Senate, with an amendment. Now, the query I wish to make is whether, if this amendment is adopted with an amendment, it will not still be in conference, even if we adopt the Senate amendment?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I will say to the gentleman that I understand not; that all the other amendments will be subject to conference, if the bill is subsequently sent to conference.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, this amendment will go to conference.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I am informed that this will go to conference also.

Mr. MADDEN. This controversy will never end.

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I do.

Mr. MADISON. I rose to a parliamentary inquiry. I thought the gentleman from New York had concluded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MADISON. Is it now in order to amend further by adding other articles to the free list?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Speaker, I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has the floor and is entitled to finish his statement.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The immediate result of the Payne-Aldrich tariff raise in lemons was that the importations of lemons for the last fiscal year decreased over 10,000,000 pounds and the price of lemons in the markets of the East appreciably increased.

Now, this increase was put in at the demand of the California Lemon Trust, and the people of the East are thereby forced to pay the freight rate of the California lemon growers. It is just about as clear an example of the giving of special privileges by tariff rates as it is possible to obtain. Lemons, to many people of foreign birth and descent, are a necessary of life. The only purpose of the increase in the Payne-Aldrich tariff law was to raise the price of lemons in the markets of the East and increase the profits of the California Lemon Trust.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to concur with the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] moves the previous question on the motion to concur with an amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to concur in Senate amendment No. 8 with an amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. If the previous question is voted down, then this motion would be amendable, I assume, by adding other articles, either directly or by way of substitute?

The SPEAKER. There is no question but that the position of the gentleman from Illinois is correct, except his assumption that the previous question has not been ordered.

Mr. JAMES. It has already been ordered.

Mr. CANNON. I did not so understand it.

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, yes.

The SPEAKER. If any Member had offered an amendment before the previous question was ordered, if the amendment was germane, the Chair would have had to hold the motion in order, but that was not done. The question is——

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the motion by which the previous question was ordered.

Mr. JAMES. How did the gentleman vote?

The SPEAKER. There being no record, there can be no way of finding out how the gentleman voted except to take his word for it.

Mr. JAMES. We will take his word for it.

Mr. CANNON. I did not vote. I was not in the Chamber when the question was taken ordering the previous question.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that under the circumstances the gentleman can not make the motion to reconsider.

Mr. CANNON. There being no record——

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that it is not in order to make the motion to reconsider.

Mr. CANNON. One word, Mr. Speaker. As I understand the rule, the same result can be arrived at by a motion to recommit with instructions.

The SPEAKER. There is no question but what that position is correct.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, can you recommit a conference report?

Mr. CANNON. I withdraw my motion to reconsider, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, to concur in Senate amendment No. 8 with an amendment, the amendment being to strike out the period at the end of the amendment and add the words "and lemons."

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House ask the Senate for a conference on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House ask for a conference with the Senate. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. RANDELL of Texas, Mr. HARRISON of New York, Mr. PAYNE, and Mr. DALZELL.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Indian Affairs was discharged from further consideration of House joint resolution 142, and the same was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 2366. An act to acquire land along the course of Rock Creek for the purpose of preventing the pollution and obstruction thereof and of connecting Potomac Park with the Zoological Park and Rock Creek Park and providing a new location for the United States Botanic Garden; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following personal request:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BEALL of Texas requests leave of absence for one week on account of being a member of a special committee now in session at New York City.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, August 4, 1911, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 13044) extending the time of payment to certain homesteaders in the Rosebud and other Indian Reservations in South and

North Dakota, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 115), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 3052) granting leave of absence to certain homesteaders, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 116), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred, as follows:

Also, petitions of National Consumers' League, protesting against the removal of Dr. Wiley; to the Committee on Agriculture.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, August 4, 1911.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate No. 8 to the bill (H. R. 4413) to place upon the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate; disagrees to the residue of the amendments of the Senate to the bill; asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. RANDELL of Texas, Mr. HARRISON of New York, Mr. PAYNE, and Mr. DALZELL managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 12812) to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

THE FREE LIST.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives agreeing to the amendment of the Senate No. 8 to the bill (H. R. 4413) to place upon the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles, with an amendment, disagreeing to the residue of the amendments of the Senate to the bill, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House to amendment No. 8, and further insist upon its amendments, and comply with the request of the House for a conference, and that five conferees be appointed on the part of the Senate, to be selected by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. PENROSE, Mr. CULLOM, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. BAILEY, and Mr. SIMMONS conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE COTTON SCHEDULE.

H. R. 12812, an act to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton, was read twice by its title.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance, with instructions to report to the Senate not later than the 10th day of August.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I move as an amendment that the committee be instructed to report back the bill not later than the 24th of August. That would give the same time, I understand, that was given on the wool bill, and I want to have the cotton manufacturers treated in the same manner. If the committee chooses to report back the bill the next day, we can not help that; but the people of my State want to be heard on this measure, and they ought to be heard.

I represent a State, Mr. President, that has 300 cotton mills, with a capital of $100,000,000, and in their behalf, on behalf of the 50,000 laborers who receive $15,000,000 in wages annually, I ask this simple justice, that they may be heard. I doubt whether in 10 days they can get here. This is the 4th, to-morrow is the 5th, Sunday is the 6th. It would give them only 4 days, if the committee should meet on Monday and Tuesday and Wednesday. They want a sufficient time for a hearing.

I understand that this bill, in some respects at least, ought to be amended. I see that in the debate in the House of Representatives it was admitted that there is an increase in the tariff of 250 per cent on some of the goods which are made in my own State, and I will protest against that. My people do not want any increase; they want a revision; but they want a fair and a just revision of this schedule. They want to be heard, and the people of this country ought to be heard upon this subject. The men who are particularly interested as well as all the people ought to be heard upon this subject, and especially ought the manufacturers to be heard.

There is a good deal of difference between this bill and some other bills here. So far as a trust in cotton or cotton goods is concerned, I stand here to say that there is no trust and never has been a trust. There have been attempts in my State to form a trust of the cotton mills, but they have not succeeded. The mills have been suffering. Many of them have been running on half time, and some of them have gone into the hands of a receiver. They have not been declaring dividends. They want to know and I want to know what there is in this bill. They want to be heard. They ask for a revision, but they ask for a just revision. All that I ask is that these people be given time to be heard, and four days is not sufficient time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. OVERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I simply want to suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that this somewhat belated plea for a hearing upon the question of a reduction of duties on the products of the South comes with very poor grace from the other side of the Chamber, which but a day or two ago, where more than a million men were directly affected in their employment, pushed a free-trade bill through the Senate without even so much as an apology or a word of warning to the industries affected, although entire communities were harmfully involved.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; but when we did that we were standing upon the Democratic platform, which declares that there be an immediate revision in those schedules, whereas in other schedules it provides that there should be a gradual revision.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. One moment. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield further to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from North Carolina says that was a vastly different situation from the one which we confront this morning. But the unblushing truth is that the honorable Senator from North Carolina has been gored by his own horn, and the southern industry that demands from him protection at the hands of the American Congress has greater claims upon his patience and consideration and demands that different methods of procedure be pursued by the Senator from North Carolina and his associates on that side of the Chamber than in the case of industries in the North which were similarly affected a few days ago.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not at all, Mr. President. Our people are not demanding high protection. They are demanding a revision of these schedules themselves. They ask for it, but they want complete justice.

I want to say to the Senator that I voted to refer the wool bill to the Committee on Finance and give them 20 days for a hearing and a report. All I ask is that the cotton schedule be treated in the same manner. I ask no more and no less. I ask for fairness and justice.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I do not wish to antagonize the Senator's motion, but when he speaks of reference of the wool bill to the Committee on Finance with instructions to report it almost immediately he perhaps remembers that when we had the sundry civil appropriation bill under consideration the motion came from the other side of the House, and it was supported and unanimously agreed by the Democratic side of the Senate that a Tariff Board should take up the matter of the wool schedule and report next December. That was impliedly, at least, a direction, and I might almost say an agreement, that it should not be taken up until we had the benefit of a report from the Tariff Board.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is true, I think, that the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] introduced an amendment requiring the Tariff Board to report not later than the 1st of December, but there was no agreement and no understanding as to the time when the revision of the tariff should begin.

Mr. WARREN. Furthermore, the Senator speaks of the cotton industry not being governed by trusts. I will not antagonize him in that statement, but I desire to say that the wool business has never been, is not now, and, in my opinion, never can be, controlled by a trust or trusts.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, all I ask is that the same proceeding be taken with this bill that was taken on the wool bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question. Can he give us absolute assurance that Congress will be in session August 24?

Mr. OVERMAN. I can not, but I notice from the newspapers that the President is going to veto the wool bill. If he will veto the wool bill on account of not having a report from the Tariff Board, he will do the same thing with the cotton bill. If that is so, I will ask the Senator why we should go on and pass this bill? Believing it to be true, as everybody does believe, that the President is going to veto the wool bill, and will veto the cotton bill, why should we go on and debate this bill when we know that will be the result?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think we have any right to take into consideration what the President of the United States may do or may not do upon the wool bill or any other bill. It is his function to approve or disapprove acts in Congress. It is our function to pass acts or refuse to pass them, as it may be, and we ought to consider only the merits of the proposition.

Now, we have at this session put upon the free list the agricultural products of the United States, which I think last year amounted in value to nearly $9,000,000,000, representing the greatest interest in the United States. It seems to me we will be false to our duty if we do not before Congress adjourns reduce the duties upon those things which the farmer must buy.

I would have no particular objection to a postponement until the time mentioned by the Senator from North Carolina if I were sure that in the meantime some action would not be taken looking toward the adjournment of Congress prior to that date.

We adopted a motion directing the Finance Committee to report the wool bill and the free-list bill, giving the committee upon each of those bills 10 days, or something like that, for the investigation, the time suggested by the Senator from North Carolina. But the committee did not avail itself of a single hour or a single day for such investigation, and we have no reason to believe that if this bill were sent to the Committee on Finance it would attempt to make any investigation of its merits. On the other hand, if we are to be guided by precedent, we might expect that to-morrow morning the Finance Committee would, for the reasons stated before, report this bill.

For one, unless the chairman of the Finance Committee will say that within the time limited he expects to enter upon the investigation of the merits of the bill, I would be in favor of putting it upon the calendar without any reference whatsoever to the Finance Committee, and let us consider it as we can from the sources of information which are open to us.

I do not know whether the bill is such a bill as we ought to pass or not. I am just as earnest and anxious to see that no harm or injury shall come to the cotton mills, either North or South, as is the Senator from North Carolina. But I want the Congress of the United States to vote upon this measure and such other amendments to the tariff as may be added to it before adjournment, and I am opposed to any proceeding that by any possibility will permit Congress to adjourn until we have voted upon this bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator want to vote for it without understanding its provisions?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think——

Mr. OVERMAN. Has the Senator investigated the bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. The investigation through the Finance Committee would, in my opinion, be of little value in determining what I ought to do with respect to my vote upon it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that the Senator has been very diligent.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think we may follow the course we followed with regard to the wool bill. I have investigated the general subject. I have not, however, examined with care this bill that has just passed the House of Representatives. I expect, however, to be as well qualified as I can be to vote upon the bill which is finally submitted to the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator is very fair and very just; he is always very diligent to get information unless he understands the provisions of a bill. Now, this is a very intricate bill. Does the Senator think he can investigate this bill by the 10th of August sufficiently to understand it?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not want to vaunt my powers of investigation, but this is not a new subject with me. I gave it a good deal of time and a good deal of thought two years ago, and I have some rather decided convictions upon the matter. Bearing in mind that it is not altogether new, I answer the Senator from North Carolina by saying that I believe if the bill is reported from the committee by next Wednesday and we then fix a time somewhat in advance for voting upon it, with full opportunity for discussion upon the floor of the Senate before the time comes to vote, I shall be able to express my real convictions upon the subject.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, the Senator voted for 20 days' delay, I think, on the wool bill. Would he not treat the cotton mills of the South and of the North in the same way that he treated the wool business? If the committee fails to report the bill, the responsibility will be on the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. I voted for, it seems to me, 10 days' delay on the wool bill; but I am not sure about that.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think it was 20 days.

Mr. PENROSE. It was 20 days.

Mr. CUMMINS. Twenty days. I had forgotten the exact time. I believe in giving the Finance Committee a reasonable time in which to investigate and consider the bill, but I know, and the Senator from North Carolina knows, that if we were to extend the time as suggested the Finance Committee would follow the same course as it followed with regard to the wool bill and the free-list bill. More than that, if it comes to a choice between voting upon this bill with such information as we have and can get independently of the work of the Finance Committee and not voting upon it at all, I am in favor of voting upon it with such information as the Members of the Senate can get independently of the Finance Committee.

I do not want to incur any risk whatsoever of the adjournment of Congress until we revise the cotton schedule, the metal schedule, the sugar schedule, and some others that, in my opinion, contain indefensibly high duties; and I am sure the Senator from North Carolina is in sympathy with me in that desire.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I am in full sympathy with the Senator; but I want to ask him a question. It is generally understood that the President will veto the wool bill if it is sent to him early next week. I do not know whether that is so or not; but if he should veto that bill and put his veto upon the ground that Congress had passed a bill requiring the Tariff Board to report by the 1st of December, and that he would not approve any legislation upon the tariff until the Tariff Board made its report, would the Senator then, after such a message had been sent in, be in favor of going into these other schedules?

Mr. CUMMINS. I would. I do not believe that the President of the United States will or ought to say to Congress what he will do upon certain proposed acts of Congress. It would be in the highest degree improper, and I can not conceive that it will be done. The President might put his veto, if he does veto the wool bill, and I do not believe he will veto it; I believe it is a good bill; I believe the President will see that it is a good bill when he comes to examine it; and I assume that he will do what is right; and if he does what is right, he will sign the bill and not veto it; but if he does veto the wool bill, he might put his veto upon the ground that we have asked for further information with respect to the production of wool; but we have not as yet asked for any information, as I understand, with regard to the manufacture of cotton or the manufacture of iron or steel or the production of sugar. It could hardly be said that because he might disapprove one bill which did not meet his views, therefore he would veto every bill, no matter what its merits might be, that should come to him in the ordinary proceedings of Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I know that the Tariff Board is now investigating the cotton schedule, and has some 50 or 100 agents here and abroad; but that does not interest me. The Senator and I fully agree as to the revision of the tariff. If the President signs the wool bill—and I believe he ought to sign it; I believe it is a good bill—I am willing to stay here until next December and take up all these schedules; but I see no use in staying here if the President is going to veto that bill upon that ground. It would be useless to do so. It is only four months until Congress will meet again, and why all this haste? We are all tired; we are all worn out. I think we can come back here in December and revise all these schedules in the interest of the 90,000,000 people of this country.

Mr. President, what I ask is that we be treated in the same way that others have been treated in regard to the wool bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I regret exceedingly that the Senator from North Carolina should be making a plea for delay in the revision of the tariff. We are charged with duties of our own here, and I think we discharge those duties poorly when we govern ourselves in respect to them by any supposed action the President may take.

Revenue bills, under the Constitution, must originate in the House of Representatives. The House of Representatives have given careful, tedious, and protracted consideration to the revision of the cotton schedule; they have sent us a bill making radical reductions in the duties on cotton products, and the question now confronts the Senate as to whether it will adjourn without acting on that bill or will take decisive steps for its consideration. I am exceedingly unwilling, so far as I am personally concerned, to see the Senate adjourn without voting on the cotton-schedule bill which has been sent to us from the House of Representatives. It is manifest that the Senator from North Carolina is making his motion, contemplating that, if it carries, it will delay matters so that we will get no action until next December.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, why does the Senator assume that? There is a difference of only 10 days in time between his motion and mine.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why does the Senator assume that? Does the Senator assume that we are going to adjourn next week?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not assume anything. The Senator from North Carolina argued that a wise solution of the matter would be to let the bill go over until December; and I thought that was his real object in making the motion, for he argued that that was the wise course to take.

Mr. OVERMAN. I said if we were not going to have any legislation, it would be a wise course. I made the same motion that he supported in regard to the wool bill. Now, why does he say that I am trying to delay?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Because time is more precious now than it was then.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not at all. If the Senator will stand here with me, I am willing to revise the whole tariff. I am willing to revise the cotton schedule as much as he is; but when he says that I am in favor of delay, he is stating that which he ought not to state in regard to my motion, as he knows my motion was only for a 10 days' delay.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Of course, the Senator can construe his own motives and his own purposes; but I construed the argument he made to be an argument against action at the present session. I understood the Senator to argue that no harm would be done if this matter went over until December; that it was only a few months away, and we would then have ample time to give it more careful consideration.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am afraid the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield further to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am afraid the Senator did not listen to me. In my colloquy with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] I said, putting a hypothetical question, that in the event the wool-schedule bill was vetoed it would be a useless thing for us to go on and vote on this bill and have it vetoed, as we know it will be if the President should base his action upon the ground that he wanted a report from the Tariff Board. That was my reason for that statement, and that was the only reason. I am afraid the Senator did not listen to what I said.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I listened to every word the Senator said. I may not have understood his meaning as he intended it, but I understood that his argument was that, as the President was going to veto these bills anyhow, it would not make any difference if they went over until next December. It may not have been the Senator's purpose to convey that meaning, but I say I so understood his argument. I may have misunderstood him; but I certainly listened and put a construction on his words that I thought was just. I may have been mistaken; but, in any event, it matters not what the meaning of the Senator was, the adoption of his motion would probably result in the adjournment of Congress without having a vote on the cotton-schedule bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Did the Senator make his motion for 10 days because he thought the Senate would adjourn within 10 days?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I made my motion giving six days, because I believed that such consideration as was necessary might be given in six days. I felt that the Senate and the country wanted speed in these matters, wanted action, and quick action; and I thought that satisfactory action could be had within those six days.

Mr. OVERMAN. But the Senator has not answered my question. I asked the Senator if he made that motion because he believed Congress would adjourn within 10 days. I ask the Senator if that was the moving cause?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not believe Congress will adjourn in 10 days, but I know Congress is exceedingly anxious to adjourn and the country, I believe, is exceedingly anxious for it to adjourn, and I want to speed adjournment by dispatching business as quickly as possible.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator has not yet answered my question. I asked him if that was the moving cause in his asking that the bill be reported back here in six days. I ask him now if that was not the reason? I ask him to treat me as candidly as I have treated him.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have treated the Senator from North Carolina with absolute candor, and nobody who has heard my words can construe them in any other way than as being candid. I say the Senate is anxious to adjourn, and they want these matters to be speeded and want them acted on. I do not know what the Senate thinks about it, but I think we have had hearings enough. I think there are printed hearings taken at other periods that are available now, that can be seen and read and considered, and I do not believe it is necessary to have any more extended hearings than can be had within the six days afforded by the motion I have made.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator has not yet answered my question.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Well, Mr. President, I decline to yield for any such repetition of a question that I can not possibly answer. I do not know when the Senate will adjourn——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia declines to yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. But I do not intend, if I can avoid it, to see any time wasted about this matter. I think six days ample time, and I believe that the Finance Committee will do with this bill as it did with the wool bill, and will report it to-morrow morning. There is no necessity, in my judgment, for hearings. We have had hearings; they have been printed, and they are available. There has been no such change of conditions as to require elaborate hearings in respect to this bill. We have revised the woolen schedule, and there is no reason why we should make an exception of the cotton schedule bill. I want these products treated alike. I want the Southern States to come up to the rack and give to the consuming public that same measure of justice which was given to them in respect to woolen fabrics. I see no reason to differentiate the cotton products from the woolen products. I want the cotton schedule revised. There is no time for hearings and no necessity for hearings, as we have had sufficient hearings, which have been printed and can be resorted to by all who desire information.

I hope my motion will prevail, and I hope the Finance Committee will report the bill to-morrow morning, so that we may go along, consider it, pass it, and reduce the duties on cotton fabrics as we have attempted to do on woolen fabrics.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator if he is willing to pass this bill as it comes from the House? Is he willing to increase the tariff 250 per cent on goods made in the South?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I have not scrutinized the items of this bill. I expect to do so in the next six days; and if there is any provision in it which my judgment does not approve, I shall vote against that provision; but I will be glad to vote on it as quickly as possible, and I want the Finance Committee to bring it before the Senate within the six days, as provided by my motion.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, if the Senator has read the RECORD this morning, he will have seen that Mr. UNDERWOOD practically admits that there is an increase in several items in the bill. I am not here to vote for an increase in tariff duties for our southern people. I want the cotton schedule revised as much as the Senator does, but I want it revised in the right way. I want to say I understand that the increase resulted from a clerical error and was not intended by the Ways and Means Committee of the House, but it is in the bill, and therefore the bill should receive consideration by the Committee on Finance in order that they may correct that inequality. Although it is a clerical error, it is in the bill, and it makes an increase in one item of 250 per cent and in another of 20 per cent, affecting the lower classes of goods which are manufactured in the South. We of the South do not want any such high protection; we do not want any protection at all. We want a just and equal revision of the tariff, as the Senator from Virginia has said. And that is all I claim for my people.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina can hardly contend in any serious way that it will take more than six days to correct an error which is admitted to be a clerical error. If there are any errors in this bill let them be corrected and let the Senator from North Carolina, and all Senators, if clerical errors or errors of judgment exist in the bill, endeavor to remove them. I simply say, give us a hearing; let us have this bill back in the Senate; let us vote on it; and let us make sure that we do not adjourn until we treat the cotton schedule just as we have treated the woolen schedule. Let us proceed with the execution of our duties in this respect regardless of the way in which we may theorize as to the probable course the President may take. Even in case the President should veto the woolen schedule bill, that does not indicate that he will also veto the cotton schedule bill. Let us send to the President equitable, fair, and proper bills providing for a just downward revision of the tariff in the interest of the great body of the American people, and let him deal with those bills when they are laid before him. We should not halt or hesitate on the theory that the President will do less than his duty or more than his duty. Let us do our duty by sending him these bills, and let him then take the responsibility which devolves on him under the Constitution.

I hope, Mr. President, that my motion will be adopted and that we shall have an opportunity speedily to take up this bill, consider it, and vote upon it.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the conferees on the part of the Senate on the wool bill met this morning. They will have to meet to-morrow. Monday has been agreed on by unanimous consent to vote upon the statehood resolution. It is not unlikely that a recess will be taken late on Monday afternoon or in the evening, and that the statehood resolution will not be finally disposed of until Tuesday. It will be impossible to call a meeting of the Committee on Finance on the cotton measure until Wednesday of next week, and that would leave the time for hearing or consideration so short, under the original motion or the amendment, as to render the proposition of holding hearings absolutely out of the question. It would certainly be unfair for the committee to hear the constituents of the Senator from North Carolina and be unable to grant hearings to the hundreds of persons from all over the United States who have made requests of the chairman of the committee for hearings upon the very complicated schedules of this measure. Therefore if haste is the purpose of the majority in the Senate, and not deliberation and intelligent consideration and discussion, I am absolutely in sympathy with the Senator from Virginia and shall do all I can to expedite the measure in the committee by having it reported the next morning should this motion or the amendment be adopted. If the matter were to be taken up as it should be taken up, there ought, of course, to be no limitation, and the measure ought to go over until the next regular session of Congress when the report of the Tariff Board may be here, a method of tariff revision which has been clamored for by many all over the country for years and which is in practical and effective operation.

But if it is simply speed to pass some kind of a bill, I am in earnest sympathy with the purpose of expedition, and will endeavor to have the bill promptly reported, so that this Congress may adjourn at an early date and relieve the business interests of the country of the uncertainty and the menace under which they are now conducting business. Neither the motion nor the amendment, in my opinion, should be adopted, but if either is, I will use every effort to comply with the spirit of it by securing immediate action.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, it is well known that the House did not give hearings either to those interested in the manufacture of wool or in the manufacture of cotton. When the wool bill was referred to the Committee on Finance, as I remember it—and if I am not correct about that I hope the chairman of the committee will correct me—nobody appeared before the committee asking to be heard. I assume if anyone interested in the wool schedule had appeared before the committee and asked for hearings, the committee would have accorded them hearings to the extent of the time allowed in the resolution.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. In reference to hearings, it was expressly stated, I believe, by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and others that it was a physical impossibility to notify the very many persons wanting hearings on the wool bill, many of whom were absent with the herds and could not have been reached for some time, and to have them here within the limit fixed by the resolution offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Committee on Finance would not have refused those interested in wool an opportunity to be heard if the committee had supposed that it had sufficient time to give them adequate hearings.

Mr. PENROSE. Had there been sufficient time, the committee would have been only too glad to take the bill up intelligently and considerately and to have gone into it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then the reason the committee acted at once was, first, there was nobody present representing the wool interests asking to be heard, and there was not sufficient time to get those interested before the committee.

Mr. PENROSE. It was considered to be unfair and impossible to grant hearings to a few without granting hearings to the majority of substantial and responsible persons who desired a hearing.

In connection with the reciprocity bill, as the Senator from North Carolina, who is a member of the committee, knows, the committee sat patiently for nearly a month and heard over 100 persons. But to go into extensive hearings in an industry which covers the continent in its various phases and to say to one person he shall be heard and to another that he shall not is unfair and impracticable.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SIMMONS. In just one moment. Then the Senator from Pennsylvania, as I understand, says substantially what I stated at first, that there was no disposition on the part of the Committee on Finance to deny hearings to those interested in wool had the condition been such as to allow adequate hearings.

Mr. PENROSE. The committee would have welcomed hearings to show the inherent defects in that measure had it been in any way possible to bring the proper persons to Washington within the time set by the limitation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, it is perfectly evident, when we remember the time that was given, that so far as the woolgrowers were concerned, they had not time to get here. We could not get a letter or summons to them and have them reach here until after the date set for the Finance Committee to report the bill. The majority of the wool grown in this country is grown in localities distant from railroad points and far distant from this point. It was absolutely impossible for woolgrowers to appear within the time given. Perhaps it was made so purposely. I do not make that accusation. But when 18 or 19 days only are given for the consideration of a subject of that kind you can not, by letters, reach men 2,000 miles away from here, and, perhaps, 100 or 200 miles away from post offices or railroads, as some of them are, and have them appear here. It was perfectly understood that they could not come.

Mr. SIMMONS. I agree entirely with the Senator from Wyoming. The time was not sufficient for full hearings.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, it is perfectly evident that hearings before the Finance Committee can result in no good. Nearly all the testimony taken before the Finance Committee on Canadian reciprocity was in opposition to that project, and yet the majority of the Finance Committee were entirely oblivious to that testimony. Judging by what they did in that case, what is the good of having hearings in this case? You can pile testimony upon testimony mountain high, and it may make no more impression than it did in the matter of Canadian reciprocity. So what is the good of having a reference to the committee at all? It did no good in that case. We got no help from the committee in that case. We from the Northwest who were so vitally affected had to fight our battles without any help from that committee, and the whole testimony was as though it had been dropped in the Potomac River and had sunk out of sight.

Mr. SIMMONS. What the Senator says is doubtless true in reference to the Canadian reciprocity hearings. But that is no reason why persons interested in these great subjects about which we are legislating should not be given a reasonable opportunity to present their views to the Congress. If the Congress, having light, refuses to see, that is the fault of Congress.

Mr. President, my understanding is that the cotton-mill people—certainly in my State, and I think it is so elsewhere—are very anxious to have an opportunity to present to Congress before final action their views about this matter. They have complained to me most bitterly because they were not permitted to go before the Committee on Ways and Means in the House, and they have asked me as a member of the Finance Committee to use my influence to try to get them a hearing before that committee.

I certainly do not desire any more time than is reasonably necessary to give them an opportunity to come before the committee and make such presentation of their cause as they may see proper. But I do think there is no such urgency as requires that we should cut these people off and give them no opportunity to be heard at all in either branch of Congress.

I know we are all very anxious to get away from here; that we feel the pressure of time very much. I suggest to my colleague that he amend his motion so as to require the committee to report on the 20th instead of the 24th.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no objection. I will make that amendment. All I want is that people who are demanding to be heard shall be heard. Every man in this country who wants to be heard ought to have a hearing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] amends his amendment to provide for the 20th rather than the 24th instant.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest to my colleague also that the people living in the cotton-mill section of this country can arrive here within 48 hours.

Mr. SIMMONS. They can get here somewhat earlier than the woolgrowers could, and therefore less time will do. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] suggests the 15th, but I think the 20th would be about as little time as would reasonably be required.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I suggest to make it the 15th. I think that would be agreeable to all parties.

Mr. OVERMAN. Just to show that I am not moving for delay, as suggested by my friend the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], I will accept the suggestion and make it the 15th.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina modifies his amendment.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I simply desire to say that I do not believe hearings of any value can be had or any complete or satisfactory hearings—new ones—can be had between now and the 10th or between now and the 15th either; and I sincerely hope that my motion will prevail and that it will not be amended, and that this bill shall be reported back to the Senate on or before the 10th day of August.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator from Virginia will permit me, I want to assure him that the cotton-mill people who have talked to me, some from New England as well as from North Carolina, have assured me that they had no purpose to bring about delay; that they honestly desired an opportunity to state their case and only that. The 15th would hardly give ample time, but as a matter of compromise I am willing to agree to that.

Mr. PENROSE. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia moves that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance with instructions to report it back on or before August 10. The Senator from North Carolina offers an amendment, making the date August 15. Upon the amendment the Senator from Pennsylvania asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BACON. I understand the vote is upon the question of fixing the 15th.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the motion.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). I again announce that I have transferred my general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and vote "yea."

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when the name of Mr. DAVIS was called). I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] is paired with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. Were he present, and I permitted to vote, I should vote "nay." In his absence, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BURNHAM. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. GALLINGER] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is out of the city. He is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. I will let this announcement stand on all votes that may be had to-day.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is absent, engaged on the Lorimer committee. He is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. NELSON. I desire to state that the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] is paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. If the senior Senator from North Dakota were present, he would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I notice he has not voted. I therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 51, as follows:

YEAS—12.

Bacon	Foster	Newlands	Simmons
Bryan	Johnston, Ala.	Overman	Thornton
Dixon	Martine, N. J.	Owen	Warren

NAYS—51.

Bankhead	Clarke, Ark.	Kern	Reed

So Mr. OVERMAN'S amendment to the motion of Mr. MARTIN of Virginia was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance, with instructions to report to the Senate not later than the 10th day of August.

Mr. PENROSE. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (when his name was called). I again announce my general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER]. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CULBERSON. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], and vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BACON. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], and vote "yea."

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] has a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 38, nays 26, as follows:

So the motion of Mr. MARTIN of Virginia was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The presentation of petitions and memorials is in order.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a petition of the International Longshoremen's Association, praying that the hours of labor for dredge operators engaged on Government work be limited to eight hours a day, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. SHIVELY presented petitions of the Retail Merchants' Association, of Connersville; the Chamber of Commerce, of South Bend; and the Business Men's Association, of Evansville, all in the State of Indiana, praying for the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WETMORE presented a petition of the Business Men's Association, of Pawtucket, R. I., praying for the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of the Commercial Club, of Brainerd, Minn., praying for the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Mankato District of the National League of Postmasters, of Mankato, Minn., praying for the establishment of a parcels-post system, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

LOANS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a part of an editorial from the Washington Times on the loan-shark bill.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE LOAN SHARKS AND THEIR METHODS.

The new Massachusetts law governing the business of loan sharks could well be studied by our District guardians, who seem unaccountably slow getting some protective legislation for this city.

Massachusetts' act takes effect this week, and is the culmination of careful consideration and considerable legislative experience with this business. It is the demonstration that legislation on this subject is no wild experiment in an unknown field. It is no foolish interference with legitimate business. It is simply the effort to make usury laws efficient, to give the poor man a decent chance, to stop one of the worst kinds of oppression that is exercised in our cities against the needy and the ignorant.

The business is falling rapidly into control of "chains" of agencies in cities. If a borrower moves from one town to another, the agency in his new town is promptly on his trail. Interest rates actually earned are found in some agencies to have run to 300 per cent a year. The heavy risks are found much exaggerated; losses are really very few.

Most of the loan companies extend credit for amounts ranging from $5 to $50. For a loan of $5 one pays in several companies $1 per week for 7 weeks; for a $10 loan the payments are $1 per week for 15 weeks, or $1.50 for 10 weeks; for a $15 loan $2 per week is exacted for 10 weeks, and for a $20 loan, $2.50 per week for 10 weeks. The favored patron whose credit is good for $25 pays $1.80 for 20 weeks, or $2 per week for 18 weeks. A $50 loan, which is not often made, calls for three monthly payments of $21.60.

The new Massachusetts law establishes a supervisor of loan agencies, and gives him plenary power. After careful investigation it was found that the rate of interest could not be fixed by the law, so provision was made that its maximum should be 3 per cent a month, but the State supervisor has authority to regulate it. No assignment of wages by a married man is legal unless indorsed by his wife, and in no case is an assignment good unless accepted in writing by the employer of the borrower.

A common practice among the Massachusetts companies, it was discovered, is to have the borrower make his note for a larger sum than he actually gets. Then the companies claim that they are not technically loaning money, but "buying notes!" This sort of procedure is not to be countenanced. In order to prevent it the supervisor is given full power to investigate all books, papers, and accounts of the agencies whenever he wishes, so that he may know whether such transactions are going on.

It is a standing reproach to the government of Washington that our legislative authority seems unable or incapable of dealing intelligently with these problems of the modern, complex life of cities. Congress contains few experts in municipal affairs. It ought to make the best use of those it has. It ought to seek the experience and guidance of outside experts in city administration. These things it notoriously does not do.

* * * * *

This affair of the loan-shark legislation has developed a very similar situation. The Senate's debate the other day showed how innocent of any real, useful information are most of the men whose votes will decide what sort of a law on this loan question Washington will get, or whether it will get any.

This sort of government is bad for the city and a discredit to the system under which it is imposed.

HON. ROBERT J. WALKER.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, in view of the reference made to the history, political and otherwise, of Hon. Robert J. Walker by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], I hold in my hand a letter from a loving and loyal son of Robert J. Walker, which I desire may be read and printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read the letter.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, although I regarded it as an indecent performance in the beginning for any Senator to bring to this Chamber the reply of a private citizen to what a Senator had said in the course of a debate, I made no objection to the reading of that document; and had it been a decent attempt to set his father's record right, I would not now object to its appearing in the RECORD; but it is offensive in more than one respect and untruthful in several respects. The writer undertakes to quote a statement I made, and quotes only part of it. For instance, he declares that I charged that his father was then holding a public office under a Republican administration, while the RECORD shows that I said his father "was holding or had held." In view of its offensive character, I move that the communication be excluded from the RECORD.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I trust that the Senator's motion will not prevail. I insist, in all fairness, that the letter read is not only a touching and forcible tribute from a loyal and loving son, but a splendid defense of a loving father. I insist that the sheer statement of the Senator from Texas that it is untrue is not adequate. These assertions are made by a gentleman responsible for all he says, who is an honored and dignified son of the Commonwealth from which I come. I submit further, Mr. President, that I thought the distinguished Senator went out of his way to traduce and make small the memory of that great Democrat and public servant, the Hon. Robert J. Walker, when he came in the day after his first speech on reciprocity and offered further data in the way of a pamphlet to prove that this gentleman, who had done honored service to his country, was not a Democrat. The question was not a partisan one; it was not whether Robert J. Walker was a Democrat or whether he was not. The controversy at issue at the time the Senator offered the pamphlet regarding Robert J. Walker was upon the great, broad, moral question of reciprocity, not as to what was the politics of Robert J. Walker. I trust in all sincerity, I trust in all earnestness and deference, that you, Senators, as fair-minded, liberal, honorable, and brave men, will not now move further to traduce and belittle the memory of the honored citizen and splendid Democrat, Robert J. Walker.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I am no more inclined to reply to the Senator from New Jersey than I am to that private citizen.

I ask the yeas and nays on my motion to exclude that communication from the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). The Chair desires to ask the Senator from New Jersey, the present occupant of the chair not having been present at the time he made his request, did the Senator from New Jersey ask unanimous consent for the insertion of this document in the RECORD?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I did, sir; and it was declared granted by the Vice President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas objects.

Mr. BAILEY. No, Mr. President, the Senator from Texas does not object. The Senator from Texas moved, after the communication had been read, in view of its offensive character, to exclude it from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I trust that motion will not prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The matter having been read is now in the RECORD, but the Senator from Texas moves that it be excluded from the RECORD, and on that motion demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll and called the name of Mr. BACON.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, before my name was called the Senator from Louisiana——

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I ask to be recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] is recognized.

Mr. BACON. I want to say that I did not respond to my name because before my name was called the Senator from Louisiana had twice addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not see the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. BACON. I have not responded to my name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the circumstances the Chair will revoke the order that the Secretary proceed with the roll call, and will hear what the Senator from Louisiana has to say.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the Senator from Texas whether, under the circumstances, he would consider the publication of this letter in the RECORD as being personally offensive to him? Is that the ground upon which he objects?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I think it would be offensive to the Senate for a citizen to undertake to answer a Senator's speech and to assert that the Senator had misrepresented the facts in any case. I believe that would be offensive to any Senator in this body, and I know it is offensive to me.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I make the point of order that unanimous consent has already been given that this letter be read and be printed in the RECORD, and it can not be revoked in view of that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that, in the opinion of the Chair, the point of order is not well taken. The matter was read by the Secretary from the desk. Hence it is already a part of the RECORD. The Senator from Texas moves that it be excluded from the RECORD.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The point that I make, however, is that unanimous consent of the Senate has been given that the letter be printed in the RECORD, and that a motion in contravention of that unanimous consent, or action taken under it, is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is constrained to overrule the point of order raised by the Senator from Washington. The Senate has given unanimous consent to have the letter printed in the RECORD to-day, and then to-morrow it may by a majority vote decide otherwise. The matter is in the power of the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My understanding was that the Senate had, since the brief time I have been here, made several rulings to the effect that the Senate could not overrule a unanimous-consent agreement and take contrary action to the action which had been previously taken by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not consider that the granting of unanimous consent for the printing of matter in the RECORD is in the nature of a unanimous-consent agreement such as the Senator from Washington refers to.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I desire to state to the Senate, particularly to the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], that it is very far from me to pursue or venture a word or thought that might justly be offensive to any Senator on this floor. I feel that I am too big for such narrowness. I had no thought of doing an ungenerous or an unkind thing. In fact, sir, I had this communication two days ago.

I desired to present it, for I felt that in justice it should be associated beside the charges that were made against this man's father; but I desisted for the reason that I felt that sheer manhood demanded that I should await the presence of the Senator, and I have waited until the Senator might be present. I say that with no just reason can the distinguished Senator from Texas or any other Senator charge or claim my intention was to be offensive.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not understand that unanimous consent was given. The letter was presented and read to the Senate, but I myself intended to object to its going into the RECORD, and it was not on account of the unanimous consent that it has gone into the RECORD. It has gone into the RECORD now on account of having been read. The motion to strike out is certainly in order, and if the Senator from Texas had not made it, I myself would have made the motion, because I do not believe that the RECORD is the place where a controversial statement outside of the Chamber, made by a private individual, should be recorded as against a Senator of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has so ruled.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I only desire to make the RECORD clear, in order that the ruling of the Presiding Officer upon the point of order that I have made may appear as a precedent of this body. I contend that the RECORD shows that the Senate did give unanimous consent not only for the reading of the letter, but for its printing in the RECORD. I say that in view of the different opinion held and expressed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] expressly requested that the document be read and be printed.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I would say, Mr. President, if I may be permitted——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Before I——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey is out of order. Does the Senator from Washington yield?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I say, before I presented the paper and before the consent was given, I consulted with the President of this body, Vice President SHERMAN, and stated to him that I had a letter from Mr. Duncan Walker, the son of Robert J. Walker, and asked that I might present it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, it is only in view of the statement made by the Senator from Utah that I rise again to refer to the matter. I understood that the Presiding Officer ruled squarely upon the point and upon the RECORD, as I understood it to be, notwithstanding the fact that unanimous consent had been given. The question of the RECORD is now raised by the Senator from Utah; but the RECORD itself undoubtedly will show that the Senator from Utah is mistaken as to what took place when the Senator from New Jersey offered the document.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Washington and of the Senate to the distinction between the consent which was assumed to have been given in this case and what we generally understand by "unanimous consent." There is a kind of unanimous consent which we have when debate is proceeding out of order, and the Chair announces that it is proceeding by unanimous consent; in other words, it is proceeding in the absence of objection; but it is a very different thing when the Senate, in order to regulate its proceedings, determines by unanimous consent upon a certain course, that it will vote at a certain time, for instance, or anything of that kind. That is of peculiar importance; it is not a slight matter to vary it in any way, and our rule is not to vary it in any way, even by subsequent unanimous consent; but in this instance there was no submission of the question to the Senate by the Chair, and there was no call for a submission to the Senate by the Chair. Therefore no unanimous consent was given, and when the proposition was submitted by the Senator from New Jersey it was only a unanimous consent in the sense that I have indicated, just as the Chair frequently announces that debate is out of order but is proceeding by unanimous consent. It has a dignity, but it is not to be considered in the same light at all as the unanimous-consent agreements which we formally make in order to control our method of procedure.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I think there is little need to split hairs as to whether unanimous consent was given or otherwise, because I think the matter is in another way disposed of. If unanimous consent were given, the fact of the matter is that that unanimous consent was carried out, that its full purpose was fulfilled, and that the matter is now in the RECORD. So the former unanimous consent falls, and we are confronted with a bare record of this matter, and the question is now whether it shall be stricken out on the motion of the Senator from Texas. I do not think the question of unanimous consent enters into it at this moment in any way whatever.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am perfectly willing, Mr. President, to submit to the ruling of the Chair upon this proposition. I desire to say, however, that I am unable to see any distinction between one unanimous consent and another unanimous consent. The Chair announced that there was no objection, and must have so announced before the reading could have been proceeded with. Whether or not he formally asked the question if there was objection, it must be assumed that he asked it, otherwise he would have had no authority to announce that there was unanimous consent.

I do not propose to argue now the soundness of the parliamentary rule under which it has been held the Senate can not, even by unanimous consent, revoke what has been done by unanimous consent. It has always seemed to me to be a sound proposition that the Senate ought to be able to govern its action at all times, at least by unanimous consent, and that certainly by unanimous consent, at least, it should be able to modify or revoke a previous unanimous consent; but nevertheless it is a ruling, it is a precedent of the Senate, which I have seen put in practice at various times, that it can not interfere, even by unanimous consent, with what it has done by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to state——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. One moment, if you please.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is about to make a statement on a parliamentary question.

The Chair desires to state that, whether unanimous consent was given or not, the matter is in the RECORD, the paper having been read by the Secretary from the desk. The motion of the Senator from Texas is that it be excluded from the RECORD.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, in view of the rolling up that seems to have been incurred by the offering of an innocent letter from an old gentleman who is 75 years of age, defending the memory of an honored father, and as it has touched the quick to such an extent, I desire to withdraw it.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I object to the withdrawal of it. I want that matter passed upon.

Mr. BORAH. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I rose to the point which has just been made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon the motion of the Senator from Texas, which is that the matter be excluded from the RECORD. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] to the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and will vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 49, nays 0, as follows:

YEAS—49.

Bacon	Clark, Wyo.	Martin, Va.	Smith, Mich.
Bankhead	Crane	Martine, N. J.	Smoot
Borah	Cummins	Nelson	Stephenson
Bourne	Curtis	Newlands	Swanson
Bradley	Dillingham	O'Gorman	Taylor
Brandegee	Dixon	Oliver	Thornton
Briggs	Gamble	Overman	Townsend
Brown	Gronna	Owen	Warren
Bryan	Heyburn	Page	Watson
Burnham	Johnson, Me.	Perkins	Works
Burton	Jones	Poindexter
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Pomerene
Chilton	Lippitt	Root

NOT VOTING—41.

Bailey	Frye	McCumber	Simmons
Bristow	Gallinger	McLean	Smith, Md.
Clapp	Gore	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Clarke, Ark.	Guggenheim	Nixon	Stone
Crawford	Hitchcock	Paynter	Sutherland
Culberson	Johnston, Ala.	Penrose	Tillman
Cullom	Kern	Percy	Wetmore
Davis	La Follette	Rayner	Williams
du Pont	Lea	Reed
Fletcher	Lodge	Richardson
Foster	Lorimer	Shively

So Mr. BAILEY's motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to ask the indulgence of the Senate, referring to the ruling of the Chair on the distinction between a unanimous-consent agreement and a unanimous consent granted in the ordinary routine business, to call attention of the Senate to the note on page 492 of the Precedents of the Senate, by Henry H. Gilfry, and asks the Secretary to read the note to the Senate.

The Secretary read the note, as follows:

There is no rule of the Senate covering unanimous-consent agreements. Unanimous consent is frequently given in the routine business of the Senate, but a unanimous-consent agreement is a more formal matter. It is alone governed by custom. It is always stated in specific terms by the Presiding Officer, and, if given in reference to action to be taken on a subsequent day, is noted upon the title page of the Calendar of Business. Such consents, although not enforceable by the Chair, are never violated.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WETMORE, from the Committee on the Library, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 304) for the erection of a statue to the memory of Gen. James Miller at Peterboro, N. H. (Rept. No. 116); and

A bill (S. 305) for the erection of a statue of Maj. Gen. John Stark in the city of Manchester, N. H. (Rept. No. 117).

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 38) permitting the Sons of Veterans, United States of America, to place a bronze tablet in the Washington Monument, submitted an adverse report thereon (No. 118), which was agreed to, and the joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. ROOT, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the bill (S. 125) to permit the American Academy in Rome to enlarge its purposes, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 119) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 1327) to provide for the selection and purchase of a site for and erection of a monument or memorial to the memory of Gen. George Rogers Clark, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 120) thereon.

Mr. BRIGGS, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the bill (S. 1655) appropriating $10,000 to aid in the erection of a monument in memory of the late President James A. Garfield at Long Branch, N. J., reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 121) thereon.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 295) to adjust the claims of certain settlers in Sherman County, Oreg., reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 122) thereon.

MONUMENT TO GEN. WILLIAM CAMPBELL.

Mr. SWANSON. I am directed by the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the bill (S. 1098) for the erection of a monument to the memory of Gen. William Campbell, to report it without amendment, and I submit a report (No. 123) thereon.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HEYBURN. Let the bill go over.

Mr. WATSON. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the bill will go to the calendar.

THE THIRD DEGREE.

Mr. BORAH. I submit a report (S. Rept. 128) of a select committee of the Senate, appointed under a resolution of the Senate adopted April 30, 1910, "to inquire into and report to the Senate the facts as to the alleged practice of administering what is known as the 'third degree' ordeal by officers or employees of the United States for the purpose of extorting from those charged with crime statements and confessions, and also as to any other practices tending to prevent or impair the fair and impartial administration of the criminal law," which committee was continued after the 4th of March, 1911, and during this session of Congress by Senate resolution adopted February 21, 1911. I ask that the report be printed and that the select committee be discharged from the further consideration of the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN INDIANS.

Mr. OWEN. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 49) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to make a per capita payment to the enrolled members of the Five Civilized Tribes entitled to share in the funds of said tribes, to report it without amendment, and I submit a report (No. 124) thereon.

The joint resolution is proposed on account of three successive crop failures, as shown by the report of the Secretary of the Interior. I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if it is a report from the Indian Affairs Committee?

Mr. OWEN. It is a report from the Committee on Indian Affairs, based upon a report of the Secretary of the Interior, recommending this particular item.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the joint resolution will go to the calendar.

Mr. OWEN. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3115) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to withdraw from the Treasury of the United States the funds of the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indians, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 125) thereon.

This bill also is based upon the recommendation of the Interior Department for a like provision for the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indians. I ask that the report of the Secretary of the Interior be printed as a part of the report of the committee. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report of the Secretary of the Interior will be incorporated in the report of the committee. The Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. HEYBURN. Let the bill go to the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho asks that the bill go to the calendar. Objection is made to present consideration, and the bill will go to the calendar.

Mr. OWEN. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3151) to extend time of payment of balance due for lands sold under act of Congress approved June 17, 1910, to report it with an amendment, and I submit a report (No. 126) thereon.

This report is based upon the same condition of drought in that country. In view of the objection of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], I ask that it go to the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will go to the calendar.

Mr. OWEN. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2) supplementary to and amendatory of the act entitled "An act for the division of the lands and funds of the Osage Nation of Indians in Oklahoma," approved June 28, 1906, and for other purposes, to report it without amendment, and I submit a report (No. 127) thereon.

I ask that it go to the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go to the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BROWN:

A bill (S. 3169) granting an increase of pension to Thomas E. Ellis; to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 3170) to correct the military record of W. J. Kingsbury (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WORKS:

A bill (S. 3171) granting an increase of pension to Stephen J. F. Ruter (with accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 3172) granting an increase of pension to Michael Crane (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ROOT:

A bill (S. 3173) granting an increase of pension to Helen Louise Scott (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. OWEN:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 50) to provide for installing throughout the United States for 1912 and subsequent years many of the epoch-making improvements in the machinery of party government.

Mr. OWEN. I ask that the joint resolution may lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the joint resolution will lie on the table.

MILEAGE TO CERTAIN SENATE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. GRONNA submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 127), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That those officers, clerks, and other employees of the Senate who return to the homes in the States of the respective Senators in connection with their official duties shall be entitled to mileage at the close of each session at the rate of 10 cents per mile, to be estimated by the nearest route usually traveled in going to and returning from their homes; to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, until otherwise provided by law, upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee or the Senator with whom such person is employed.

THE SHERMAN ACT—ADDRESS OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL.

Mr. KENYON. I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a public document an address of the Attorney General of the United States, delivered July 6, 1911, before the Michigan State Bar Association, on the subject of the recent interpretation of the Sherman Act. (S. Doc. No. 83.)

There has been a very large demand for it, and it is impossible to secure copies of this address. The subject is one of very great public interest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the printing as a public document of the pamphlet he sends to the desk.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if that has not already been made a public document?

Mr. KENYON. It has not.

Mr. SMOOT. The junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] asked that one speech which was delivered by the Attorney General be made a public document, but I forget whether it was this one or not.

Mr. KENYON. This is the speech delivered before the Michigan State Bar Association July 6. It has not been made a public document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request is granted.

Mr. JONES subsequently said: I desire to ask that the address of the Attorney General which has just been ordered printed as a public document may also be ordered printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington? The Chair hears none, and the address will be printed in the RECORD.

The address is as follows:

RECENT INTERPRETATION OF THE SHERMAN ACT.

The only legitimate end and object of all government is the greatest good of the greatest number of the people. The means by which this end is attained vary in accordance with the experience and the temperament of the people. Government is necessarily more or less of an experiment at all times, but as men have been making similar experiments ever since the dawn of recorded history, the waste of repeating unsuccessful experiments of the past may be avoided by studying the records of the results of earlier effort; and, other things being equal, all thoughtful persons will agree that the probabilities of success will be greater if action be taken along lines which in the past, under similar conditions, has been attended with resulting benefit to the common weal. All history demonstrates the fact that the greatest prosperity to the State has resulted from allowing to individual effort in trade and commerce the utmost freedom consistent with the protection of society at large.

Yet the experience of the remote as well as of the recent past demonstrates the necessity of some governmental regulation of private enterprise, in order that the fruits of industry may not be entirely garnered into a few hands and that the freedom of individual effort may not be unduly restrained.

We need look no further than to the history of England, from which we derive most of our conceptions of civil liberty, for evidence of the character of evils affecting trade and commerce which commercial prosperity tends to develop and of the methods which have proved most effective in restricting those evils.

The first statute enacted in England, in 1436, against agreements in restraint of trade (15 Henry VI, reenacted 1503, 19 Henry VI, c. 7.) was directed against regulations made "by persons in confederacy for their 'singular profit and the common damage of the people.'" Note that even at that early date the action of the legislature was directed at curbing the selfish exercise of power by a few for their own benefit but to the common damage of the people.

The considerations upon which contracts in restraint of trade were held void at common law, as our Supreme Court has often pointed out, were (1) the injury to the public by being deprived of the restricted party's industry, and (2) the injury to the party himself by being precluded from pursuing his occupation, thus tending to make him more or less of a public charge. (Gibbs v. Baltimore Gas Co., 130 U. S., 396, 409.) In the case of a corporation chartered by a State to carry on a particular business, any agreement entered into voluntarily by it which impaired or restricted in any material degree its power to discharge the functions conferred upon it by the State was necessarily contrary to the public policy and void. (People v. N. River Sugar. Ref. Co., 54 Hun., 354.)

Monopolies in trade have been at all times, under all forms of government, regarded as obnoxious to the general welfare. They were early declared to be contrary to the law of England, and the outburst of popular resentment to the grant by Queen Elizabeth to certain of her favorites of the exclusive right of dealing in particular commodities compelled even that powerful monarch to disclaim any intention to offend against the popular sense of right and justice of her subjects and to blame her advisers for the acts, which she formally disavowed:

"There are no patents now of force (declared Cecil, speaking to the House of Commons concerning the various grants of monopoly) which shall not presently be revoked, for what patent soever is granted there shall be left to the overthrow of that patent a liberty agreeable to the law. There is no patent, if it be malum in se, but the Queen was ill apprised in her grant. But all to the generality be unacceptable. I take it there is no patent whereof the execution hath not been injurious. Would that they had never been granted. I hope there shall never be more. (All the House said Amen.)" (D'Ewes Journal of the Parliaments of Elizabeth, p. 652.)

The vice of monopoly was recognized in England to be the power acquired by the monopolist to control prices by excluding competition. With the tremendous development of the marvelous natural resources of a new country, and the unprecedented powers conferred by State legislation throughout the United States upon associations of individuals under corporate form, the opportunity and the machinery for the centralization of control over great industries proved so tempting to cupidity that twenty-odd years ago, even so busy, self-satisfied a people as the prosperous citizens of these United States were aroused to the necessity of checking the rapid tendency to the concentration of control of great industries into a few hands. While the State courts and legislatures attempted to deal with the subject, it was soon recognized that only the National Government could adequately grapple with an evil which had become national in its extent. The simple but unlimited power vested in Congress "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes," furnished the General Government with sufficient jurisdiction to protect the commerce of the Nation from undue restraints and monopolization.

So the act of July 2, 1890, was passed, declaring in terms so comprehensive yet so simple that it has required two decades of judicial exposition to bring their meaning home to the people with living force, that "every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of commerce among the States, or with foreign nations," is illegal, and that every person who shall monopolize or attempt to monopolize any part of such trade or commerce is guilty of a misdemeanor; and that the United States circuit courts sitting in equity shall have jurisdiction, at the suit of the United States, to prevent and restrain all violations of the act. Very slowly indeed has a full consciousness of the meaning of this law come over the intelligence of the American people. The first effort to apply it, in the Knight case (158 U. S., 1), proved abortive, partly because of an imperfect recognition of the remedies which should have been sought; partly because of a too narrow conception of the extent of congressional power over interstate commerce.

It was then successfully directed in the Trans-Missouri (166 U. S., 290) and the Joint Traffic Association (171 U. S., 506) cases against agreements between interstate railroads made to control rates of interstate transportation; but an extreme statement of the meaning of the phrase "restraint of trade," enunciated in the opinions of the court in those cases, became the basis of a school of literal interpretation which seemed bent upon reducing the law to an absurdity and thus creating a public sentiment which would make impossible its enforcement. Yet the author of those opinions in the second of them rejected, with some sarcasm, the interpretation sought to be placed upon his language in the earlier one. Observing at the outset that no contract of the nature described by counsel as those which he suggested would be invalidated by the application of the meaning given by the court to the words of the act was before the court in the case under consideration, and that there was therefore some embarrassment in assuming to decide just how far the act might go in the direction claimed, Justice Peckham said:

"Nevertheless, we might say that the formation of corporations for business or manufacturing purposes has never, to our knowledge, been regarded in the nature of a contract in restraint of trade or commerce. The same may be said of a contract of partnership. It might also be difficult to show that the appointment by two or more producers of the same person to sell their goods on commission was a matter in any degree in restraint of trade. We are not aware that it has ever been claimed that a lease or purchase by a farmer, manufacturer, or merchant of an additional farm, manufactory, or shop, or the withdrawal from business of any farmer, merchant, or manufacturer, restrained commerce or trade within any legal definition of that term; and the sale of a good will of a business, with an accompanying agreement not to engage in a similar business, was instanced in the Trans-Missouri case as a contract not within the meaning of the act, and it was said that such a contract was collateral to the main contract of sale and was entered into for the purpose of enhancing the price at which the vender sells his business."

In the Addyston Pipe case (175 U. S., 227) it was held that the act operated to invalidate an agreement between members of an association of corporate manufacturers of iron pipe, made for the purpose of controlling prices by suppressing competition among themselves. Montague v. Lowry (193 U. S., 38), was to the same effect.

In the Northern Securities case it was held that control of two competing lines of interstate railway could not be acquired by vesting a majority of the stock of each in a corporation organized under the laws of New Jersey without violating the act. In the Swift case (196 U. S., 375) a combination between competitors in the business of buying and shipping live stock and converting it into fresh meats for human consumption, suppressing bidding against each other, and arbitrarily, from time to time, raising, lowering, and fixing prices, and combining to make uniform charges to the public, was also held within the prohibition of the statute.

In the Danbury Hat case (Loewe v. Lawler, 218 U. S., 274), a combination of individuals to prevent defendants (manufacturers of hats) from manufacturing and shipping hats in interstate commerce was condemned; and in the Continental Wallpaper case (212 U. S., 227) a combination of manufacturers of wall paper, fixing prices and providing against sales except under agreements between members of the combination, was held to violate the law.

In the meantime certain of the decisions had drawn a line of differentiation by holding that the act was not intended to affect contracts which have only a remote and indirect bearing upon commerce between the States (Field v. Barber Asphalt Co., 194 U. S., 618; Hopkins v. United States, 171 U. S., 578) and that a covenant by the vendor of an interstate business to protect the purchaser from competition for a reasonable period, made as a part of the sale of the business and not as a device to control commerce, was neither within the letter nor the spirit of the act. (Cincinnati Packet Co. v. Bay, 200 U. S., 179.)

While the intent of parties entering into a particular agreement or combination, etc., was held to be immaterial where the necessary inference from the facts was that the direct and necessary result of the agreement was to restrain trade, yet in the Swift case Justice Holmes pointed out that intent was almost essential to a combination in restraint of commerce among the States and was essential to an attempt to monopolize the same:

"Where acts are not sufficient in themselves to produce a result which the law seeks to give them—for instance, the monopoly—but require further acts in addition to the mere forces of nature to bring that result to pass, an intent to bring it to pass is necessary in order to produce a dangerous probability that it will happen. * * * But when that intent and the consequent dangerous probability exist this statute, like many others and like the common law in some cases, directs itself against thaf dangerous probability as well as against the completed result." (Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U. S., 396.)

The proceeding against the American Tobacco combination brought before the court for the first time the question of the full interpretation of the statute in its application to attempts to monopolize, and in deciding the case in the circuit court Judge Lacombe expressed the extreme view of the school of literal interpretation by asserting that the act prohibited every contract which to any extent operated to restrain competition in interstate commerce.

"Size [he said] is not made the test. Two individuals who have been driving rival express wagons between villages in contiguous States, who enter into a combination to join forces and operate a single line, restrain an existing competition; and it would seem to make little difference whether they make such combination more effective by forming a partnership or not. (164 Fed., 702.)

On the other hand, Circuit Judge Hook, in the Standard Oil case, decided in the eighth circuit, after the decision in the Tobacco case, said:

"The construction of the act should not be so narrow or technical as to belittle the work of Congress, but, on the contrary, it should accord with the great importance of the subject of the legislation and the broad lines upon which the act was framed. The language employed in the act is as comprehensive as the power of Congress in the premises, and the purpose was not to hamper business fairly conducted, but adequately to promote the common interest in freedom of competition and to remove improper obstacles from the channels of commerce that all may enter and enjoy them. The wisdom of the law lies in its spirit as well as in its letter, and unless they go together in its construction and application justice goes astray."

Speaking of the application of the second section of the act, he added that the modern doctrine with respect to monopoly "is but a recognition of the obvious truth that what a government should not grant, because injurious to public welfare, the individual should not be allowed to secure and hold by wrongful means."

This being the state of the law, the four decisions involving a construction of the act rendered by the Supreme Court during the term just closed are of especial interest. The first case decided came up on writ of error brought by the United States to reverse a judgment of the circuit court in New York sustaining pleas in bar to an indictment for conspiracy to restrain interstate commerce in violation of the first section of the act. (United States v. Kissel, 218 U. S., 601.) The facts stated in the plea showed that the conspiracy had been originally entered into more than three years before the finding of the indictment. The circuit court had held that the crime was completed as soon as the conspiracy was formed, but the indictment charged a continuing conspiracy to eliminate competition. The court said:

"A conspiracy to restrain or monopolize trade by improperly excluding a competitor from business contemplates that the conspirators will remain in business and will continue their combined efforts to drive the competitor out until they succeed. If they do continue such efforts in pursuance of the plan, the conspiracy continues up to the time of abandonment or success."

The facts set forth in the indictment as the means by which the alleged purpose was to be accomplished showed that the acts committed by the defendants were for the purpose of preventing a competing company from engaging in business; that this prevention continued and could only be terminated by the affirmative act of the defendants, which act had not been performed. The plea was therefore held bad.

"A conspiracy in restraint of trade [said Mr. Justice Holmes] is different from and more than a contract in restraint of trade. A conspiracy is constituted by an agreement, it is true, but it is the result of the agreement rather than the agreement itself; just as a partnership, although constituted by a contract, is not the contract but is a result of it. The contract is instantaneous; the partnership may endure as one and the same partnership for years. A conspiracy is a partnership in criminal purposes. That as such it may have continuation in time is shown by the rule that an overt act of one partner may be the act of all without any new agreement specifically directed to that act." * * *

The next case decided was that of Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Parks & Sons Co. That was a suit in equity brought by a manufacturer of proprietary medicines prepared in accordance with secret formulæ, to prevent dealings in them by third parties in violation of a system of contracts with its purchasers, denominated as agents (wholesale distributing agents and retail distributing agents), to maintain certain prices fixed by it for all sales of its products at wholesale or retail. The court held that the evidence showed that complainant had created "a system of interlocking restrictions by which the complainant seeks to control not merely the prices at which its agents may sell its products, but the prices for all sales by all dealers at wholesale or retail, whether purchasers or subpurchasers, and thus to fix the amount which the consumer shall pay, eliminating all competition."

The court quoted the description of the essential features of the system given by Mr. Justice Lurton in his opinion in the circuit court of appeals, as follows:

"The contracting wholesalers or jobbers covenant that they will sell to no one who does not come with complainant's license to buy, and that they will not sell below a minimum price dictated by complainant. Next, all competition between retailers is destroyed, for each such retailer can obtain his supply only by signing one of the uniform contracts prepared for retailers, whereby he covenants not to sell to anyone who proposes to sell again unless the buyer is authorized in writing by the complainant, and not to sell at less than a standard price named in the agreement. Thus all room for competition between retailers, who supply the public, is made impossible. If these contracts leave any room at any point of the line for the usual play of competition between the dealers in the product marketed by complainant, it is not discoverable. Thus a combination between the manufacturer, the wholesalers, and the retailers to maintain prices and stifle competition has been brought about."

That these agreements restrained trade the court held to be obvious. That having been made as the bill alleged with most of the jobbers and wholesale druggists and a majority of the retail druggists of the country, and having for their purpose the control of the entire trade, they related directly to interstate as well as intrastate trade, and operated to restrain commerce among the several States, was also stated to be clear. The court analyzed and dismissed the contention that the restraints were valid because they related to proprietary medicines manufactured under a secret process. It further held that a manufacturer can not by rule and notice, in the absence of contract or statutory right, even though the restriction be known to purchasers, fix prices for future sales. Reference was made in this regard to the decision by the Supreme Court in the case of Bobbs-Merrill Co. v. Strauss (210 U. S., 339) that no such privilege exists under the copyright statutes, although the owner of a copyright has the sole right to vend copies of the copyrighted production, and it was said that the manufacturer of an article of commerce not protected by any statutory grant was not in any better case. The agreements in the case at bar were obviously designed to maintain prices after the complainant had parted with title to the articles, and to prevent competition among those who traded in them, and for that reason they were held to be void. The court cited a long line of cases by which it had been adjudged that agreements or combinations between dealers, having for their sole purpose the destruction of competition and the fixing of prices are injurious to the public interests and void.

"They are not saved by the advantages which the participants expect to derive from the enhanced price to the consumer * * *. And where commodities have passed into the channels of trade and are owned by dealers, the validity of agreements to prevent competition and to maintain prices is not to be determined by the circumstance whether they were produced by several manufacturers or by one, or whether they were previously owned by one or by many. The complainant having sold its product at prices satisfactory to itself, the public is entitled to whatever advantage may be derived from competition in the subsequent traffic." (220 U. S., 373, 408.)

Following these two cases, the Supreme Court next addressed itself to the decision of the case of the two great monopolistic combinations—the Standard Oil and the American Tobacco.

In the Standard Oil case the Supreme Court affirmed a decree of the circuit court which adjudged that the individual and corporate defendants had entered into and were carrying out a combination or conspiracy in restraint of interstate and foreign commerce in petroleum and its products, such as was prohibited by the first section of the act; and that by means of this combination those defendants had combined and conspired to monopolize, had monopolized, and were continuing to monopolize a substantial part of the commerce among the States, in the Territories, and with foreign nations, in violation of section 2 of the act.

This conclusion was based on the following considerations, viz:

"1. Because the unification of power and control over petroleum and its products, which was the inevitable result of the combining in the New Jersey corporation by the increase of its stock and the transfer to it of the stocks of so many other corporations, aggregating so vast a capital, gave rise, in and of itself, in the absence of countervailing circumstances, to say the least, to the prima facie presumption of intent and purpose to maintain the dominancy over the oil industry, not as a result of normal methods of industrial development, but by new means of combination which were resorted to in order that greater power might be added than would otherwise have arisen had normal methods been followed, the whole with the purpose of excluding others from the trade and thus centralizing in the combination a perpetual control of the movements of petroleum and its products in the channels of interstate commerce."

2. Because this prima facie presumption was made conclusive by considering the conduct of the persons and corporations who were mainly instrumental in bringing about the acquisition by the New Jersey corporation of the stocks of the large number of corporations which it acquired, as well as the modes in which the power vested in the New Jersey corporation had been exerted and the results which had arisen from it.

The acts of the defendants preceding the transfers to the New Jersey company of the shares of stock of a large number of other corporations were held by the court to evidence "an intent and purpose to exclude others which was frequently manifested by acts and dealings wholly inconsistent with the theory that they were made with the single conception of advancing the development of business power by usual methods, but which, on the contrary, necessarily involved the intent to drive others from the field and to exclude them from their right to trade, and thus accomplish the mastery which was the end in view."

Confirmation of the finding of a continuous intent in the defendants to exclude others from the field and themselves to dominate it was found in an examination of the exercise of its power by the combination after it was formed.

"* * * The acquisition here and there which ensued of every efficient means by which competition could have been asserted, the slow but resistless methods which followed, by which means of transportation were absorbed and brought under control, the system of marketing which was adopted, by which the country was divided into districts, and trade in each district in oil was turned over to a designated corporation within the combination, and all others, were excluded, all lead the mind up to a conviction of a purpose and intent which we think is so certain as practically to cause the subject not to be within the domain of reasonable contention."

Briefly, therefore, the decision of the court was put upon the ground that the defendant, by vesting in a New Jersey corporation the stocks of a large number of other corporations engaged in various branches of the production, refining, transportation, and marketing of petroleum and its products, which but for such control would or might have been engaged in competition with each other in interstate and foreign commerce in those commodities, had acquired the control of that commerce; and that such control was acquired and had been and was exercised with the intent and purpose of maintaining it—not as a result of normal methods of business, but by new means of combination, resorted to in order to secure greater power than would have been acquired by normal methods, and of driving out and excluding, so far as possible, all competitors in the business, thus centralizing in the combination a perpetual control of the movements of petroleum and its products in the channels of interstate commerce.

It was not alone the acquisition of a large share of commerce among the States and with foreign countries upon which the court predicated the conclusion of unlawful combination and monopolization, but the attainment of dominion over a substantial part of that commerce by means of intercorporate stock holdings in actually or potentially competing corporations, accompanied by the exclusion of competitors, and attended with continued acts evidencing an intent and purpose to retain controlling power over the business and to exclude and suppress all competition with it.

In reaching the conclusions stated the Chief Justice reviewed the history of the English law on the subject of monopolies and restraints of trade, and held that the Sherman Act "was drawn in the light of the existing practical conception of the law of restraint of trade," and that "in view of the many new forms of contracts and combinations which were being evolved from existing economic conditions, it was deemed essential by an all-embracing enumeration to make sure that no form of contract or combination by which an undue restraint of interstate or foreign commerce was brought about could save such restraint from condemnation. The statute, under this view, evidenced the intent not to restrain the right to make and enforce contracts, whether resulting from combination or otherwise, which did not unduly restrain interstate or foreign commerce, but to protect that commerce from being restrained by methods, whether old or new, which would constitute an interference that is an undue restraint."

The Chief Justice further said that as the act had not defined contracts in restraint of trade, the standard of reason, which had been applied at the common law and in this country in dealing with subjects of the character embraced in the statute, was intended to be the measure used for determining whether in a given case a particular act had or had not brought about the wrong against which the statute provided. He rejected the idea that the use of the words "every contract, etc., in restraint of trade" in the statute leaves no room for the exercise of judgment, "but simply imposes the plain duty of applying its prohibitions to every case within its literal language." This, he said, would be to make the statute "destructive of all right to contract or agree or combine in any respect whatever as to subjects embraced in interstate trade or commerce." He cited the language of Justice Peckham in writing the opinion of the court in Hopkins v. United States. (171 U. S., 578, 592.)

"To treat as condemned by the act all agreements under which, as a result the cost of conducting an interstate commercial business may be increased, would enlarge the application of the act far beyond the fair meaning of the language used. There must be some direct and immediate effect upon interstate commerce in order to come within the act."

And he observed—

"If the criterion by which it is to be determined in all cases whether every contract, combination, etc., is a restraint of trade within the intendment of the law is the direct or indirect effect of the acts involved, then, of course, the rule of reason becomes the guide * * *."

A consideration of the text of the second section, he said, serves to establish that it was intended to supplement the first and to make sure that by no possible guise could the public policy embodied in the first section be frustrated or evaded.

"In other words, having by the first section forbidden all means of monopolizing trade—that is, unduly restraining it by means of every contract, combination, etc.—the second section seeks, if possible, to make the prohibition of the act all the more complete and perfect by embracing all attempts to reach the end prohibited by the first section—that is, restraints of trade by any attempt to monopolize, or monopolization thereof, even although the acts by which such results are attempted to be brought about, or are brought about, are not embraced within the enumeration of the first section." (Hopkins v. U. S., 171 U. S., 578, 592.)

Mr. Justice Harlan, in a separate opinion, while concurring in the main with the decision of the court, interpreted the majority opinion as amounting to a reading into the statute of the word "unreasonable" before the words "restraint of trade," and vigorously protested that such interpretation was in substance the reversing of the previous deliberate judgments of the court to the effect "that the act, interpreting its words in their ordinary acceptation, prohibits all restraints of interstate commerce by combinations, in whatever form, and whether reasonable or unreasonable."

Two weeks after the decision in the Standard Oil case the court rendered its decision in the case against the tobacco combination. In his opinion, which was concurred in by all the associate justices but Harlan, the Chief Justice interpreted the opinion in the former case and answered the criticisms of Mr. Justice Harlan and those who had expressed views as to the meaning of the Standard Oil decision similar to his.

"In that case [said the Chief Justice] it was held without departing from any previous decision of the court that as the statute had not defined the words 'restraint of trade' it became necessary to construe those words, a duty which could only be discharged by a resort to reason."

He quoted the language of Justice Peckham in the Joint Traffic case. (171 U. S., 568.)

"The act of Congress must have a reasonable construction, or else there would scarcely be an agreement or contract among business men that could not be said to have, indirectly or remotely, some bearing upon interstate commerce, and possibly to restrain it.

"Applying [said the Chief Justice] the rule of reason to the construction of the statute, it was held in the Standard Oil case that, as the words 'restraint of trade' at common law and in the law of this country at the time of the adoption of the antitrust act, only embraced acts or contracts or agreements or combinations which operated to the prejudice of the public interest by unduly restricting competition or unduly obstructing the due course of trade, or which, either because of their inherent nature or effect or because of the evident purpose of the acts, etc., injuriously restrained trade, that the words as used in the statute were designed to have and did have but a like significance. It was therefore pointed out that the statute did not forbid or restrain the power to make normal and usual contracts to further trade by resorting to all normal methods, whether by agreement or otherwise, to accomplish such purpose. In other words, it was held not that acts which the statute prohibited could be removed from the control of its prohibitions by a finding that they were unreasonable, but that the duty to interpret which inevitably arose from the general character of the term 'restraint of trade' required that the words 'restraint of trade' should be given a meaning which would not destroy the individual right to contract and render difficult, if not impossible, any movement of trade in the channels of interstate commerce—the free movement of which it was the purpose of the statute to protect." (U. S. v. American Tobacco Co. et al.)

The facts presented in the Tobacco case were more intricate and involved than those in the Standard Oil case. Not only was the American Tobacco Co. the holder of stocks in other companies, but it was itself a consolidated company formed by the merger under the laws of New Jersey of three preexisting companies. The combination of many previously competing companies was created first by the transfer of shares of stock from one to the other, afterwards cemented by absolute conveyances of land, plants, and other property and business. The nucleus of the combination was the original American Tobacco Co., organized in January, 1890, and to which was at once conveyed by deed and transfer the plants and business of five different concerns, competitors in the purchase of the raw product which they manufactured and in the distribution and sale of the manufactured products. The result of this combination was to give to the new company immediately on its organization a practical monopoly of the cigarette business of the United States, and that accomplishment colored all subsequent proceedings in the widening sweep of the combination, the progress of which was noted by the Supreme Court as being attended with the constant acquisition of competing concerns, buttressed by covenants on the part of all their officers and principal stockholders not to engage in business in competition with the purchaser; and in the acquisition of many competitors, not for the purpose of continuing their operation but of closing them down and putting them permanently out of business. A summary of the salient facts dwelt on by the court as the basis for its decision was made in this language:

"Thus, it is beyond dispute: First, that since the organization of the new American Tobacco Co. that company has acquired four large tobacco concerns, that restrictive covenants against engaging in the tobacco business were taken from the sellers, and that the plants were not continued in operation but were at once abandoned. Second, that the new company has besides acquired control of eight additional concerns, the business of such concerns being now carried on by four separate corporations, all absolutely controlled by the American Tobacco Co., although the connection as to two of these companies with that corporation was long and persistently denied.

"Thus, reaching the end of the second period and coming to the time of the bringing of the suit, brevity prevents us from stopping to portray the difference between the condition in 1890, when the (old) American Tobacco Co. was organized by the consolidation of five competing cigarette concerns, and that which existed at the commencement of the suit. That situation and the vast power which the principal and accessory corporate defendants and the small number of individuals who own a majority of the common stock of the new American Tobacco Co. exert over the marketing of tobacco as a raw product, its manufacture, its marketing when manufactured, and its consequent movement in the channels of interstate commerce—indeed, relatively, over foreign commerce and the commerce of the whole world, in the raw and manufactured products—stand out in such bold relief from the undisputed facts which have been stated * * *." (U. S. v. American Tobacco Co. et al.)

These undisputed facts, the court well said, involved questions as to the operation of the antitrust law not hitherto presented in any case. They clearly demonstrated that the acts, contracts, agreements, combinations, etc., which were assailed were of such an unusual and wrongful character as to bring them within the prohibitions of the law.

"Indeed," said the Chief Justice, "the history of the combination is so replete with the doing of acts which it was the obvious purpose of the statute to forbid, so demonstrative of the existence from the beginning of a purpose to acquire dominion and control of the tobacco trade, not by the mere exertion of the ordinary right to contract and to trade, but by methods devised in order to monopolize the trade by driving competitors out of business, which were ruthlessly carried out upon the assumption that to work upon the fears or play upon the cupidity of competitors would make success possible." (U. S. v. American Tobacco Co. et al.)

These conclusions were stated to be inevitable, not because of the vast amount of property aggregated by the combination, not because alone of the many corporations which the proof showed were united by resort to one device or another, not alone because of the dominion and control over the tobacco trade which actually existed, but because the court was of opinion that the conclusion of wrongful purpose and illegal combination was overwhelmingly established by the following considerations:

1. The fact that the first organization or combination was impelled by a previously existing fierce trade war, evidently inspired by one or more of the minds which brought about and became parties to the combination.

2. Because, immediately after that combination, the acts which ensued justified the inference that the intention existed to use the power of the combination as a vantage ground to further monopolize the trade in tobacco by means of trade conflicts designed to injure, either by driving competitors out of the business or compelling them to become parties to the combination.

3. By the ever-present manifestation of a conscious wrongdoing by the form in which the various transactions were embodied from the beginning—now the organization of a new company, now the control exerted through taking up stock in one or another or in several, so as to obscure the result actually attained, evidencing a constant purpose to restrain others and to monopolize and retain power in the hands of the few who, from the beginning, contemplated the mastery of the trade which followed.

4. By the absorption of control of all the elements essential to the manufacture of tobacco and its products, and placing such control in the hands of seemingly independent corporations serving as perpetual barriers against others in the trade.

5. By persistent expenditure of large sums in buying out plants, not to utilize but to close up, rendering them useless for the purposes of trade.

6. By the constantly recurring stipulations exacted from manufacturers, stockholders, or employees, binding themselves generally for long periods not to compete in the future.

From all of these acts the court deduced the conclusion that the defendants had been engaged in a largely successful effort, extending over a period of years, to monopolize (that is, wrongfully to acquire to themselves) the dominion over the manufacture and marketing of tobacco and its products and accessories, not by normal methods of business, but by unfair and subtle methods of combination, resorted to in order to secure greater power than they could have acquired by normal methods of business, and with the intention of driving out and excluding so far as possible all other competitors and centralizing in the combination a perpetual control of the movements of tobacco and its products and accessories in the channels of interstate and foreign commerce.

The remedy to be applied in the Standard Oil case was comparatively simple and obvious, and the decree of the circuit court which, with slight modifications, was affirmed by the Supreme Court, to use the language of that court, "commanded the dissolution of the combination, and therefore, in effect, directed the transfer by the New Jersey corporation back to the stockholders of the various subsidiary corporations entitled to the same, of the stock which had been turned over to the New Jersey corporation in exchange for its stock, and enjoined the stockholders of the corporations after the dissolution of the combination from by any device whatever recreating directly or indirectly the illegal combination which the decree dissolved."

A far more intricate problem was presented in the Tobacco case, as was frankly recognized by the court. Conveyances, consolidations, and mergers, and the dissolution of previously existing corporations whose stocks and properties had been acquired, had so blended the whole combination into new form as to make it impossible to effect a dissolution by the simple method applicable to the Standard Oil case, and therefore the Supreme Court said that, in determining the relief proper to be given, it might not model its action upon that granted by the court below, but in order to award relief coterminous with the ultimate redress of the wrongs which the court found to exist, it must approach the subject of relief from an original point of view. In considering the subject from that aspect, the court said that three dominant influences must guide its action:

"1. The duty of giving complete and efficacious effect to the prohibitions of the statute; 2, the accomplishment of this result with as little injury as possible to the interest of the general public; and, 3, a proper regard for the vast interests of private property which may have become vested in many persons * * * without any guilty knowledge or intent in any way to become actors or participants in the wrongs which we find to have inspired and dominated the combination from the beginning."

For the purpose of meeting that situation the court declared that it might at once resort to one or the other of two general remedies:

"(a) The allowance of a permanent injunction restraining the combination as a universality and the individuals and corporations which form a part of or cooperate in it in any manner or form from continuing to engage in interstate commerce until the illegal situation be cured * * * ; or, (b) to direct the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the assets and property in this country of the combination in all its ramifications for the purpose of preventing a continued violation of the law, and thus working out by a sale of the property of the combination or otherwise a condition of things which would not be repugnant to the prohibitions of the act."

The court, however, in consideration of the public interests and that of innocent participants, determined to send the case back to the circuit court, with directions to endeavor to ascertain and determine upon some plan or method of dissolving the combination and working out a lawful condition of things, if that could be done within a period of six months, with a possible extension of two months longer; but that in the event that such condition of disintegration in conformity with the law should not be brought about within that time, it should be the duty of the court "either by way of an injunction restraining the movement of the products of the combination in the channels of interstate or foreign commerce or by the appointment of a receiver to give effect to the requirements of the statute."

Probably no more drastic decree has ever been entered by the Supreme Court than this. The court remits to the circuit court the execution of a decree of dissolution of a combination of 67 corporations and 29 individuals, with assets amounting to upward of $400,000,000 book value and net earnings exceeding $36,000,000 per annum; which had acquired 77 per cent of the entire business of the United States in manufactured tobacco, plug and smoking tobacco; 96 per cent of snuff; 77 per cent of cigarettes; 91 per cent of little cigars, and 14 per cent of cigars and stogies, and which has acquired probably the most extensive monopoly of interstate and foreign commerce ever created in the world. This combination was ordered to be resolved into, not necessarily its original elements, but, in effect, to be divided up into a number of separate and distinct integers, no one of which should threaten monopoly, and which should not either by reason of their organization and business or in their relation to each other constitute combinations in restraint of interstate or foreign commerce. The Supreme Court not only empowered but directed the circuit court, in case this lawful condition should not be brought about within a period of six or eight months, to either appoint a receiver of this vast property for the purpose of, by sale or otherwise, working out the ordered disintegration, or by injunction to paralyze and end its conduct of interstate business. Those who have thoughtlessly yielded to the superficial conclusion resulting from the application by the Chief Justice of the rule of reason to the interpretation of the Sherman law, can find but little to justify the idea that the Sherman law has been rendered ineffective by those two decisions, for precisely the contrary is clearly established by these great judgments. The most cursory examination of the decree in the tobacco case, the most casual consideration of the drastic and far-reaching remedy imposed, makes it perfectly apparent that the Sherman law, perhaps for the first time, has been demonstrated to be an actual, effective weapon to the accomplishment of the purpose for which it was primarily enacted, namely, the destruction of the great combinations familiarly known as trusts.

The main reliance of the defendants in both the Standard Oil and the Tobacco cases was the decision in United States v. Knight (156 U. S., 1) to the effect that the acquisition of a number of manufacturing plants in one State by a corporation of another State was not within the intent of the Sherman law, even though the purchaser thereby acquired upward of 90 per cent of all the refineries of sugar in the United States, because manufacture alone and not commerce was involved. The Knight case had been distinguished in subsequent cases as not involving any questions of interstate commerce. In the Standard Oil case the court dismissed it with scant consideration, saying—

"The view, however, which the argument takes of that case and the arguments based upon that view have been so repeatedly pressed upon this court in connection with the interpretation and enforcement of the antitrust act, and have been so necessarily and expressly decided to be unsound, as to cause the contentions to be plainly foreclosed and to require no express notice."

The court cited as illustrative of this point the cases of United States v. Northern Securities Co. (193 U. S., 334), Loewe v. Lawler (208 U. S., 274), United States v. Swift & Co. (196 U. S., 375), Montague v. Lowry (193 U. S., 38), Shawnee Compress Co. v. Anderson (209 U. S., 423).

But the decision in the case of West, Attorney General, v. Kansas Natural Gas Co., rendered May 15, 1911, goes further in overthrowing the doctrine of the Knight case than any of those cited by the Chief Justice in the Standard Oil case, or than the obvious disregard of its authority in the latter case. In the Knight case, the facts presented in the evidence were taken by the court as involving merely the acquisition by one corporation of manufactories wholly within the State, and it was held that such acquisition was not within the power of the Congress of the United States to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign countries.

"Doubtless (said Chief Justice Fuller) the power to control the manufacture of a given thing involves in a certain sense the control of its disposition, but this is a secondary and not a primary sense. * * * Commerce succeeds to manufacture and is not a part of it.

"* * * The regulation of commerce applies to the subject of commerce and not to matters of internal police. Contracts to buy, sell, or exchange goods to be transported among the several States, the transportation and its instrumentalities and articles bought, sold, or exchanged for the purpose of such transit among the States, or put in the way of transit, may be regulated, but this is because they form part of interstate trade or commerce. The fact that an article is manufactured for export to another State does not of itself make it an article of interstate commerce, and the intent of the manufacturer does not determine the time when the article or product passes from the control of the State and belongs to commerce."

The cases of Coe v. Errol (116 U. S., 517) and Kidd v. Pearson (128 U. S., 1) were cited in support of the proposition that functions of manufacture and commerce were different; that to hold otherwise would be to invest Congress, "to the exclusion of States, with the power to regulate not only manufactures, but also agriculture, horticulture, stock raising, domestic fisheries, mining—in short, every branch of human industry." That contracts, combinations, or conspiracies to control domestic enterprises in manufactures, agriculture, mining, production in all its forms, or to raise or lower prices or wages, might unquestionably tend to restrain external as well as domestic trade, the court conceded, but it said that such restraint would be an indirect result, however inevitable and whatever its extent, and such result would not necessarily determine the object of the contract, combination, or conspiracy. So it was held in Kidd v. Pearson, that the refusal of a State to allow articles to be manufactured within her borders, even for export, did not directly affect external commerce and did not trench upon the congressional control over interstate commerce.

In the case of West, Attorney General, v. Kansas Natural Gas Co., the Supreme Court reviewed decisions of the United States Circuit Court in suits having for their common purpose an attack upon the constitutional validity of a statute of Oklahoma, framed for the purpose of prohibiting the transportation or transmission of natural gas from points within that State to points in other States, this prohibition sought to be accomplished by various provisions in the statute under review. The statute was held to be prohibitive of interstate commerce in natural gas, and consequently a violation of the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. Mr. Justice McKenna, writing the opinion of the court, said that the act presented no embarrassing questions of interpretation.

"It was manifestly enacted in the confident belief that the State has the power to confine commerce in natural gas between points within the State. * * * And the State having such power, it is contended, if its exercise affects interstate commerce it affects such commerce only incidentally; in other words, affects it only, as it is contended, by the exertion of lawful rights and only because it can not acquire the means for its exercise."

The results of the contention, the court held, repel its acceptance.

"Gas, when reduced to possession, is a commodity; it belongs to the owner of the land, and, when reduced to possession, is his individual property subject to sale by him, and may be a subject of intrastate commerce and interstate commerce. The statute of Oklahoma recognizes it to be a subject of intrastate commerce, but seeks to prohibit it from being the subject of interstate commerce, and this is the purpose of its conservation. In other words, the purpose of its conservation is in a sense commercial—the business welfare of the State, as coal might be, or timber. Both of these products may be limited in amount, and the same consideration of the public welfare which would confine gas to the use of the inhabitants of a State would confine them to the inhabitants of the State. If the States have such power, a singular situation might result. Pennsylvania might keep its coal, the Northwest its timber, the mining States their minerals. And why may not the products of the field be brought within the principle? Thus enlarged, or without that enlargement, its influence on interstate commerce need not be pointed out. To what consequences does such power tend? If one State has it, all States have it; embargo may be retaliated by embargo, and commerce will be halted at State lines. And yet we have said that 'in matters of foreign and interstate commerce there are no State lines.' In such commerce, instead of the States, a new power appears and a new welfare, a welfare which transcends that of any State. But rather let us say it is constituted of the welfare of all of the States and that of each State is made the greater by a division of its resources, natural and created, with every other State, and those of every other State with it. This was the purpose, as it is the result, of the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. If there is to be a turning backward, it must be done by the authority of another instrumentality than a court. * * * At this late day it is not necessary to cite cases to show that the right to engage in interstate commerce is not the gift of a State, and that it can not be regulated or restrained by a State, or that a State can not exclude from its limits a corporation engaged in such commerce."

If, therefore, the State can not control the transmission of natural gas produced within its borders to other States, because to concede that control would be in effect to empower it to cut off at its source all of the objects of interstate commerce, how can it retain the right to prohibit the manufacture within its limits of commodities intended to be shipped in interstate commerce? Commodities when so manufactured are precisely like natural gas reduced to the possession of the owner; that is, a commodity which belongs to him as his individual property is subject to sale by him, and may be the subject of interstate and intrastate commerce. It is true the statute did not deal with the production of the gas, and to that extent, possibly, it is not in conflict with Kidd v. Pearson and Coe v. Errol. Yet if the constitutional right of Congress to regulate interstate commerce attaches to the commodity the moment it is in existence in the hands of the owner, so that the State may not prohibit its shipment in interstate commerce, does it not apply as well from that moment to prevent the owner from himself, by combination or agreement, imposing an undue restraint upon its shipment in such commerce? What the State is prohibited from doing the citizen may not do, and the Sherman Act attaches from the moment the commodity comes into existence to prevent any impediment being laid upon its possible passage into the ordinary and usual currents of commerce among the States.

Summing up the results of these late decisions, therefore, it will be seen that the area of uncertainty in the law has been greatly narrowed and that its scope and effect have been pretty clearly defined; the school of literal interpretation has been repudiated, and the application of a rule of reasonable construction declared. There will be always, of course, a field of uncertainty in so far as an investigation of facts, particularly when intent becomes a necessary consideration, is required. But this much may surely be said to be now beyond controversy.

That ordinary agreements of purchase and sale, of partnership, or of corporate organization do not violate the first section of the Sherman Act, even though incidentally and to a limited degree they may operate to restrain competition in interstate or foreign commerce between the parties to such agreements.

But any contract, combination, or association the direct object and effect of which is to control prices, restrict output, divide territory, refrain from competition, or exclude or prevent others from competing in any particular field of enterprise, imposes an undue restraint upon trade and commerce and is in violation of the first section of the act. This principle applies to all associations of competitors of the character usually known as pools; to agreements with so-called wholesale or retail agents whereby the manufacturer of an article, even though made according to some secret process or formula, seeks to control the price at which it may be sold by purchasers directly or indirectly from the manufacturer. It applies also to attempts to control competition between independent concerns by means of a stockholding trust, whether individual or corporation holder.

Size alone does not constitute monopoly. The attainment of a dominant position in a business acquired as the result of honest enterprise and normal methods of business development is not a violation of the law. But unfair methods of trade, by destroying and excluding competitors by means of intercorporate stockholdings, or by means of agreements between actual or potential competitors, whereby the control of commerce among the States or with foreign countries in any particular line of industry is secured or threatened, expose those who are concerned in such efforts to the penalties prescribed in the second section of the act, because they are engaged in monopolizing or attempting to monopolize such commerce.

It is also now settled that no form of corporate organization, merger, or consolidation, no species of transfer of title, whether by sale, conveyance, or mortgage, and no lapse of time from the date of the original contract, conspiracy, or combination can bar a Federal court of equity from terminating an unlawful restraint or compelling the disintegration of a monopolistic combination. The maxim nullum tempus occurrit regi is applicable to any continuing combination or conspiracy which the antitrust act of 1890 condemns.

Speaking of the conscious development of institutions in America, Prof. Woodrow Wilson, in his work on the State, writes:

"It is one of the distinguishing characteristics of the English race, whose political habit has been transmitted to us through the sagacious generation by whom this Government was erected, that they have never felt themselves bound by the logic of laws, but only by a practical understanding of them, based upon slow precedent. For this race the law under which they live is at any particular time what it is then understood to be, and this understanding of it is compounded of the circumstances of the time. Absolute theories of legal consequence they have never cared to follow out to their conclusions. Their laws have always been used as parts of the practical running machinery of their politics—parts to be fitted from time to time, by interpretation, to existing opinion and social condition."

If this law, designed to protect the people of this country from the evils of monopoly and to preserve the liberty of the individual to trade freely, shall now be clearly understood; if its true purpose shall be recognized and its beneficent consequences realized, the 20 years of slowly developed interpretation and widening precedent will not have been without great value. For the law will henceforth be used, to employ Dr. Wilson's language, as a part of the running machinery of our political system, adapted to the needs of our social condition.

COAL AND ASPHALT ON CERTAIN INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. GAMBLE. I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document three letters from the Secretary of the Interior, the first on the bill (S. 2350) providing for the valuation of the segregated coal and asphalt lands in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations in the State of Oklahoma, and for the sale of the surface and the disposition of the mineral rights therein; the next on the bill (S. 2831) to provide for the sale of the surface of the segregated coal and asphalt lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations in Oklahoma; and the third on the bill (S. 2998) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell the surface of the segregated coal and asphalt lands belonging to the Chickasaw and Choctaw Tribes of Indians. (S. Doc. No. 85.)

It is a very important subject, and the Committee on Indian Affairs has ordered a hearing thereon. It will facilitate the hearing very much if the papers can be printed as a document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the request is granted.

ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT TAFT.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the address of President Taft to the Philadelphia Medical Club, at the Bellevue-Stratford, Philadelphia, Pa., May 4, 1911, be printed as a public document. (S. Doc. No. 84.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

CONSIDERATION OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning business is closed.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate resolution No. 109, providing for a certain program of legislation and for a recess of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In view of the fact that we have only a few minutes before the unfinished business will come up automatically I object.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think there will be no debate upon it. I simply want to have a vote.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not want to take any chances.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from Nevada.

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 14) to admit the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona as States into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, which had been reported from the Committee on Territories with amendments.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Chamberlain	La Follette	Pomerene
Bailey	Chilton	Lippitt	Root
Bankhead	Clark, Wyo.	Martin, Va.	Shively
Borah	Clarke, Ark.	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Bourne	Crane	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Bradley	Crawford	Newlands	Smoot
Brandegee	Cullom	Oliver	Stephenson
Briggs	Cummins	Overman	Swanson
Bristow	Foster	Owen	Taylor
Bryan	Gamble	Page	Wetmore
Burnham	Gronna	Perkins	Works
Burton	Heyburn	Poindexter

Mr. BRYAN. My colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] is absent on business of the Senate. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] requested me to state that he is absent on business of the Senate in the Lorimer investigation. I make this announcement for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it is not my intention to speak at any length upon this occasion, but I will at least outline one or two points in a very brief time.

I do not know whether Senators realize that this proposed constitution for the State of Arizona affects the Senate of the United States or not. I have not heard it suggested that it does. But section 5 of article 8, which deals with the question of the election of members of the legislature of the new State, will affect the title of the Members of this body. It is provided in section 5 that—

> No recall petition shall be circulated against any officer until he shall have held his office for a period of six months, except—> except that it may be filed against a member of the legislature at any time after five days from the beginning of the first session after his election.

It is not difficult to see how you could disseminate a legislature if you did not desire that the legislature should elect a United States Senator. It would be all planned beforehand. The petitions could be circulated and would be ready at hand, so that before the time fixed by law for the election of a Senator the members of the legislature, or a sufficient number of them, could be recalled, either to break a quorum or to recall the adverse members of the legislature. A man who wanted to get rid of an opponent in the legislature would simply have the petitions there for the recall of the members opposed to him, because it requires only 25 per cent of the vote to recall, and it would be very easy to get the 25 per cent.

I wonder if that crept in or was put in for a purpose. If the Senate of the United States were to concur in that provision as a part of the constitution of a State, the creation of which is by Congress, I should be very much surprised. I am not going to discuss that question at length. It is obvious on the face of the constitution.

This recall provision also authorizes the recall of judges.

To recur to the other question, the statute does not require that any special ground shall be made the basis of the recall. You can recall a man because you do not like the color of his hair. That under this provision would be quite sufficient. You could describe your dislike to his complexion in 200 words, get the petition signed, and he is recalled. When the petition is filed he is recalled, not when it is acted upon, because it does not require that the petition shall be acted upon. He is recalled by the filing of the petition. It says so. So you would recall all the members of the legislature who were going to support the other candidate. Probably it would be a mutual affair and would result in the recalling of every member of the legislature.

Now, that is a nice provision to be placed in the organic law of a State.

Following that, the election does not have to occur for 30 days after the member of the legislature is recalled. During that interval the time might expire in which a United States Senator could be elected, because if the legislature expired, say, on the 1st day of March, and the recall petition was filed on the 2d day of February, or the 1st day even of February, the election need not occur until after the expiration of the session of the legislature at which a Senator was to be elected.

Then, again, you may repeat this recall as often as a new man is elected. New members of the legislature being elected in lieu of those who were recalled, the recall petition might be filed against the new member at any time within the limitation, and so on. You could destroy a legislature, and what men can do or are authorized to do the law presumes they will do. There could be repeated withdrawals as fast as new men are elected. There would be no difficulty in defeating a United States Senator, and that affects this body; it affects the Congress of the United States. It is our duty to see to it that no such provision as that is put in the organic law of any State, because through it this body might be destroyed. If the wave of political insanity is going to sweep on and overtake other States, tempting them to adopt such constitutional provisions as that found in section 5 of article 8, we might destroy utterly this body.

They have used loose language in section 1 of article 8. While it is susceptible of a construction that would probably remove the objection, yet it is not quite certain why they used the word "in," in the first line, instead of the word "of." They say, "Every public officer in the State holding an elective office, either by election or appointment, is subject to recall." I assume that when men use an unusual term or word they would have a purpose in doing it. Is a Member of Congress within the scope of that provision? A Member of Congress is not a national officer; he is an officer of the State or the congressional district that elects him. That is what the courts say. Does he come within that provision? Can they recall a Member of Congress, or can they raise the question——

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. WORKS. Does the Senator believe that if any such provision were made it would be effective or could be enforced; that is, if it could be given that construction?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not need to go that far. I do not need to go beyond the consideration of the question as to whether or not it might be contended——

Mr. WORKS. That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think neither the Senator from California nor myself would want to give a final judgment in that matter. But why did they use the unusual language?

Mr. WORKS. Does the Senator say he is not willing to give an opinion upon that question?

Mr. HEYBURN. At the proper time I should not shrink from giving an opinion.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator declines to do it now.

Mr. HEYBURN. But it is not necessary to do it. It is not necessary to arrive at an ultimate conclusion at this time. I think the Senator was not in the Chamber when I was discussing the provisions of section 5 of article 8 with reference to the election of members of the legislature.

Mr. WORKS. I am very sorry that I was not in, for I should have been very glad to have heard what the Senator had to say about it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not make that remark to draw from the Senator from California a regret that he was absent, but merely to explain that he had not heard all the story.

Now, I shall content myself with just pointing out a few of these as texts for consideration, and later, before a vote is taken upon this question, I shall discuss it.

Under the provisions of this article a judge may be recalled after he has been in office six months; and when the judge is recalled the question that the people vote upon is, Was there sufficient reason existing for recalling him? In that question would be involved the righteousness of his decision; and the people at the polls would have to sit as an appellate tribunal upon the decisions of the judge that had been made the subject of attack. Instead of trying those cases in the court and rendering a judgment and abiding by it, no judgment would be final until at least six months after it had been rendered, and the people would have to pass upon it.

I happen to be possessed of one of these Populist, no, Socialist ballots. There is the ballot [exhibiting] in one of the States of the United States at the last election, upon which is printed the questions that the people were to pass upon at that election. There it is [exhibiting]. It is printed in small type, quite small, something smaller than pica. Of course I have no doubt that any Senator here could comprehend the questions involved that were submitted at that election, but I will undertake to say that not one person in five thousand outside of this Chamber could do it. I wonder if Senators have had an opportunity to see the practical working of this thing. That is an actual ballot in one of the States at the last election.

In order that Senators in reading the RECORD may be prepared for a further consideration of this question, I am going to call their attention to another instance of the practical operation of the recall. I have here the proceedings in a city that has a Socialist mayor and city government, and these proceedings were June 6, 1911. Dr. Woods was elected mayor of the city. The local organization of Socialists took action on the 5th or 4th of June of this year in regard to that mayor. I read:

The Socialist local—

That is what they call their organization—

The Socialist local Sunday afternoon gave Dr. J. T. Woods, mayor of Coeur d'Alene, the alternative of presenting his resignation to the council as mayor, stepping down and out, or following out the wishes of the present Socialist local and heeding the mandates already imposed at a recent meeting.

I am reading real history now of facts occurring within a month. This was done on Sunday. They hold their meetings preferably on Sunday. If the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] were present, he probably would be interested in that question. This is what they do:

It is understood that these orders to the mayor are briefly comprised in the following, although couched in different, language:

But I have the official check-up on this. This is really the statement. First, they demand:

1. The removal of George Evans as acting chief of police.

That is, this local board demands of the mayor the removal of George Evans as acting chief of police.

2. The temporary appointment of John Flemming as chief of police.
3. Removal of City Gardener William Degner.
4. The appointment of C. A. Waters in place of Degner.
5. The appointment of B. F. Huggins for sanitary police officer.
6. The appointment of A. D. Brown to take the place of Flemming on the police force.

The skirmish that was anticipated was a very tame affair, the vote being 30 to 9—

That is, in this local—in favor of giving Dr. Wood the alternative.

The local members resent the report published in a Spokane paper intimating that the local demands the appointment of H. A. Barton as chief of police. They brand this as false. They demand Flemming's promotion, so they claim.

The resolution embodying the local's demand is briefly summed up as follows:

"If Mayor Wood does not comply with the demands of the Socialist local before the next council meeting, that the secretary be ordered to hand in his (Wood's) resignation."

After it was moved and seconded it was carried by a referendum vote.

Those political principles and schemes seem to be so interwoven that you do not know just when you are on one side of the line or the other.

It is claimed the State organizer will be here in the near future, and then things will be doing and the stillness of the Potomac will be a mere dream.

The local indorsed the publication of a paper in the city and wished it Godspeed in the field.

This mayor had been in office but seven weeks when this action was taken against him.

That merely gives you a very accurate and correct knowledge of the kind of government that these Socialists propose. One of the most prominent features which it claims "is its right to discipline and control the official actions of its officers, agents, committees, and elected representatives in all matters wherein the integrity and obligations of the party is at stake, whether on strictly party matters or matters relating to the fulfillment of the party's obligations or pledges to the public."

That is the kind of government that is threatened. That was on June 6. July 28, a few days ago, they took final action:

Mayor Wood is expelled from the Socialist Party by a solid vote of the local—He fails to attend meeting—Twenty-five pass upon charges against doctor—Principal charge is willful declaration and refusal to comply with the imperative mandates of local.

It is not often that we are favored with so candid an expression of the policy which they pursue when they have the power. I should have read, before the Senator from the State of Washington left the Chamber, the proceedings in Spokane, an adjoining section of the country, in which substantially the same things are ordered and sought to be accomplished.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. OLIVER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN responded to his name.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would not object, but that is not within the power of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is in doubt whether unanimous consent can be given to dispense with a roll call after there has been an answer to a name.

Mr. HEYBURN. I wish it could be done, but it can not be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed with the roll call.

The roll call was resumed and concluded, the following Senators having answered to their names:

Brandegee	Gronna	O'Gorman	Shively
Burnham	Heyburn	Oliver	Simmons
Burton	Johnson, Me.	Page	Smith, Mich.
Chamberlain	Martine, N. J.	Perkins	Smoot
Clark, Wyo.	Myers	Reed	Warren
Curtis	Nelson	Root

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Only 23 Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is not present.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the names of the absentees be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the list of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators.

Mr. BRISTOW, Mr. BORAH, Mr. BRIGGS, Mr. BOURNE, Mr. BRYAN, Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. CHILTON, Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, and Mr. SWANSON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Only 32 Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is not present.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 2 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, August 5, 1911, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 4, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we lift up our hearts in gratitude to Thee for the advanced movement toward the higher and better civilization, witnessed by the peace pact of three great nations looking to the abolishment of war with all its horrors and to the establishment of a world-wide peace. God grant that the remaining nations may speedily follow the glorious example; that all the peoples of all the earth may join the angelic chorus which has been sounding down the ages, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men," and æons of praise we will give to Thee. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FOWLER. Is any matter which takes place on the floor of this House by a Member who has not received recognition from the Chair a proper matter to be incorporated in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. The rule has been that if the gentleman from Illinois, for instance, is addressing the House, and some other Member asks leave to interrupt him, and the gentleman from Illinois declines to be interrupted, and the other Member persists in talking, the Speaker has the right to strike out what the interrupting Member said after he had been notified that interruptions were not desired. But it takes all of that to get it out.

Mr. FOWLER. The reason I inquired was that my distinguished colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is in the habit of injecting matter of that character into this RECORD. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, touching the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] touching my other colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN] yesterday, as I recollect it, although I have not yet examined the RECORD, my colleague [Mr. MANN] did ask for an extension of five minutes from my other colleague.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire five minutes in which to address the House?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no. It is touching the practice of the House governing interruptions. I do not know, not having examined the RECORD, whether my colleague [Mr. MANN] addressed the Speaker and was recognized or not. Does my other colleague [Mr. FOWLER] desire that recognition to be stricken out?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, that is not the matter to which I referred, because my distinguished colleague [Mr. MANN] received recognition from the Chair on that occasion. That is not the source of my objection, and I do not wish that to be stricken out at all.

THE PEACE TREATIES.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, the whole country to-day has had the information flashed to the people that the President yesterday signed general arbitration treaties between the United States and Great Britain and between the United States and France. They have been transmitted to the Senate, and with their ratification a remarkable step toward complete international peace will have been taken. In aid of that universally hoped-for world policy I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an address upon arbitration between the United States and Great Britain delivered at the recent Peace Congress at Baltimore by that eminent American prelate, Cardinal Gibbons:

ARBITRATION BETWEEN GREAT BRITAIN AND THE UNITED STATES.

[An address delivered at the Third National Peace Congress held at Baltimore, May 4, 1911, by his eminence James Cardinal Gibbons, archbishop of Baltimore.]

I was asked to open these exercises with prayer, but I thought that a formal invocation was unnecessary on the present occasion, for every discourse uttered to-day will be a prayer in the sacred cause of peace.

I presume that the principal object of this distinguished assemblage is to advocate closer and more amicable relations between England and this country. I am persuaded that the signing of a treaty of arbitration between Great Britain and the United States would not only be a source of incalculable blessings to these two great powers, but would go far toward the maintenance of a permanent international peace throughout the civilized world.

Both of these great nations have many things in common. We speak the same noble tongue, and the English language is more universally used to-day than any other language on the face of the earth. The classic writers of England, from Chaucer to Newman, and the classic authors of America are also claimed by Great Britain. The literature of both countries is a common heritage to both nations.

We also live under practically the same form of Government. The head of one nation is a King, the head of the other nation is a President. England is governed by a constitutional monarchy, the United States isruled by a constitutional Republic. And I believe that both of these nations have been more successful in adjusting and reconciling legitimate authority with personal liberty than any other country of the world.

England is mistress of the ocean. Her ships ply through every sea on our globe. Her flag floats over every harbor of the world. Her Empire embraces a territory comprising 10,000,000 square miles, or about one-fifth of the whole globe. Great was the Roman Empire in the days of imperial splendor. It extended into Europe as far as the River Danube, into Asia as far as the Tigris and Euphrates, and into Africa as far as Mauritania. And yet the Roman Empire was scarcely one-sixth of the extent of the British Empire of to-day. Daniel Webster, in a speech delivered in the American Senate some 70 years ago, thus describes the extent of the British possessions: "A power," he says, "which has dotted the surface of the whole globe with her possessions and military posts, whose morning drumbeat, following the sun and keeping company with the hours, circles the earth with one continuous and unbroken strain of the martial airs of England."

The United States rules nearly 100,000,000 of happy and contented people. Our Government exercises a dominant and salutary influence over the American continent. Our influence is not to destroy, but to save; not to dismember, but to preserve the peace and automony of our sister Republics.

If England and Americo were to enter into an alliance of permanent arbitration with each other, such a bond of friendship and amity would be a blessing not only to those two great powers, but to all the nations of the civilized world.

When the waters receded from the earth after the deluge, Almighty God made a colemn convenant with Noah and his posterity, that the earth should never again be destroyed by water, and as a sign of this covenant, He placed a bow in the heavens. Let Brittania and Columbia join hands across the Atlantic and their outstretched arms will form a sacred arch of peace, a rainbow of hope, which will excite the admiration of the nations and will proclaim to the world that with God's help, the earth shall never more be deluged with bloodshed in fratricidal war.

The time seems to be most auspicious for the consumption of this alliance. It meets with the approval of the President of the United States, who honors this meeting by his presence. I earnestly hope that it will have the sanction of Congress now in session. It meets with the approval of Sir Edward Grey, English minister of foreign affairs. It has the cordial sympathy of the distinguished gentlemen assembled here to-day, the President of the United States, Mr. Andrew Carnegie, and many others too numerous to mention, and I pray that these gentlemen may receive the title promised by the Prince of Peace to all who walk in His footsteps: "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God."

CERTAIN EXPENSES OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on House joint resolution 130, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up the conference report on House joint resolution 130 and asks that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement (No. 114) are as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 130) making appropriations for certain expenses of the House of Representatives incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 4, 7, 8, and 9.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 5, and 6, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert the matter proposed to be added by said House amendment on page 2, after line 10, of the joint resolution; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 10: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Government Printing Office. To enable the Public Printer to pay messengers to CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and work of committees, on night duty during the special session of the present Congress, for extra services rendered, $400 each, $1,200.

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate amending the title of the bill and agree to the same.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 130) making appropriations for certain expenses of the House of Representatives, submit the following written statement in explanation of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

On amendments Nos. 1 and 2: Appropriates $3,695 to reimburse the official reporters of the Senate for clerk hire and other extra clerical services and transposes to its proper place in the resolution, under the caption "House of Representatives," the provision reimbursing the official reporters of the House for clerk hire and other extra clerical services.

On amendment No. 3: Strikes out the provision, proposed by the Senate, paying one month's extra pay to officers and employees of the Senate and House.

On amendment No. 4: Strikes out the appropriation of $100, proposed by the Senate, to pay J. H. Jones for extra services for the care of the Senate chronometer.

On amendment No. 5: Inserts the provision, proposed by the Senate, with reference to two employees in the Senate post office, the net result of which is to reduce the salary of one of said employees $288.

On amendment No. 6: Appropriates $2,500, as proposed by the Senate, for folding speeches and pamphlets for the Senate.

On amendment No. 7: Strikes out the provision to pay certain employees in the Senate Office Building one month's extra pay.

On amendment No. 8: Strikes out the provision, proposed by the Senate, directing the Secretary of War to inquire and report as to certain expenditures made by the State of Texas during the period from 1856 to 1861.

On amendment No. 9: Strikes out the provision, proposed by the Senate, with reference to the Interior Department, concerning the use of funds provided for said department for the purchase and distribution of supplies for subordinate offices and Indian schools.

On amendment No. 10: Appropriates $1,200, intsead of $1,400, for extra services of messengers to the Congressional Record and work of committees on night duty at the Government Printing Office.

It is recommended that the amendment of the Senate changing the title of the joint resolution be agreed to.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARNER. As to amendment No. 8, I understand that the purport of that was to secure certain information from the War Department, and what I gather is that that information can be secured without the passage of this amendment put on by the Senate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Inquiry was made at the War Department, and Gen. Ainsworth, who is familiar with the entire matter, expressed the opinion that the War Department has all the authority necessary to transmit to Congress the information called for in the amendment proposed by the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to say that the absence of the name of Mr. BARTLETT, of Georgia, one of the managers on the part of the House in this report and statement, is due to the fact that he is detained in the city of New York on the committee investigating the Steel Corporation. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill H. R. 2983, an act for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Thirteenth Census, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendments. The bill as it comes to the House is substantially the same as the one that passed the House. The first amendment spoken of changes the phraseology in section 4 so as to provide for the conditions that may exist in some States according to the views of some parties.

This amendment, while it is somewhat similar to one voted down by the House, is not of such a character as to interfere with the passage of this bill, and ought not to be considered in connection with the importance of passing an apportionment bill.

The second amendment is a provision as to how candidates shall be nominated and elected by the State at large, providing that it shall be done in the same manner as candidates are nominated for governor in such State, unless otherwise provided by law of the State.

Considering these amendments, members of the Committee on the Census have been in consultation, and also with other Representatives, and we think that the House ought to concur in the amendments, in view of the importance of passing an apportionment bill at this session. Before I yield the floor I desire to say that I ask for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves the previous question.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendments.

The question was taken, and the Senate amendments were agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HOUSTON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate amendments were agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] be allowed to address the House for one hour.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Texas will withhold his request for a short time, I desire to present two little resolutions from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri presents a privileged matter.

HAROLD W. KETRON.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I present the privileged report (H. Rept. 117), House resolution 257.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 257.

Resolved, That Harold W. Ketron, Democratic pair clerk, be paid $25 out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, for five days' services, from April 4 to April 10, 1911, inclusive.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear a statement from the gentleman.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Ketron performed the duties of assistant pair clerk between the 4th day of April and the 10 day of April, before he was sworn in. He did not receive his appointment because of the illness of the Sergeant at Arms, whose duty it was to make the appointment, and he was therefore not sworn in. He performed the duties of that office, however, during those six days.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

ASSISTANT ENROLLING CLERK.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts, which I send to the desk and ask to have read. (H. Rept. 118).

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 122.

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint an assistant clerk to said committee, who shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $6 per day during the remainder of the present session.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Enrolled Bills has one clerk. Heretofore they have had an assistant clerk. We have not provided the assistant clerk during this session, but from now on the probabilities are there will be several private bills that will be passed and the enrolling clerk will have quite a lot of work to do. It is necessary to have an assistant. This resolution simply provides a session clerk for the remainder of this session.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. LLOYD. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. How many bills have we had enrolled during this session of Congress?

Mr. LLOYD. There have not been many bills enrolled thus far.

Mr. MADDEN. How many bills are there likely to be enrolled?

Mr. LLOYD. There are likely to be quite a number.

Mr. MADDEN. How long does it take a man to enroll a bill?

Mr. LLOYD. I can not answer that question.

Mr. MADDEN. Why does the clerk there need any assistant clerk when there is nothing for him to do?

Mr. LLOYD. An assistant is needed in enrolling bills, to compare the bills.

Mr. MADDEN. I thought the gentleman from Missouri recommended a system of economy when we first organized the Sixty-second Congress, and now he is beginning to recommend a system of extravagance.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I did recommend, with this side of the House, a system of economy, and we have saved the expense of an assistant clerk in that committee. We are now asking nothing but what has always been done just at the close of the session, and that is to authorize additional assistance to complete the work.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman from Missouri know that the House has not been in session except about every other day since the special session began? We have been adjourning three days at a time, and there has been nothing to do for the regular clerk who is there.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. LLOYD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is this assistant Journal clerk one of the places abolished by the resolution which passed the House some time ago following the action of the Democratic caucus?

Mr. LLOYD. No. The annual clerk was the one that was abolished.

Mr. MANN. I say the assistant Journal clerk.

Mr. LLOYD. This is the clerk to the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

Mr. MANN. Well, was there not an assistant clerk in the enrolling room whose office was abolished by that resolution?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Now, does the gentleman say that after having abolished the assistant in the enrolling clerk's office, with the business so far transacted by the House at this session, they need an assistant clerk to the Committee on Enrolled Bills there now?

Mr. LLOYD. We need an assistant clerk only for the remainder of the session on account of the special bills that are likely to be passed in the next few days.

Mr. MANN. No bills have been passed yet; and if we need an assistant in the enrolling clerk's office for the next few days, does that not mean that we will need one during the entire next session?

Mr. LLOYD. This bill provides only for the remainder of this session.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to me for four or five minutes?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite likely that there ought to be an assistant enrolling clerk appointed. It is certain that there ought to be some one appointed who knows something about enrolling bills. The other day we just agreed to a conference report on a House joint resolution in reference to making an appropriation for pages in the House and some employees of the Senate. We passed that resolution in reference to pages of the House and it went to the Senate. The Senate added on some amendments, and when the resolution came back to the House on amendment No. 2 my colleague from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] moved to concur, with an amendment. Now, every one who has ever been in a legislative body knows that the two branches of the legislative body communicate to each other by resolutions as to the action taken in the respective bodies; but in this case, with no one connected with the administration of the House who was familiar enough with ordinary legislative procedure to do the thing properly, what did they do? They took the little paper upon which was written the amendment offered by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and pasted it on to the Senate engrossed copy of the Senate amendment, and sent it back to the Senate in that shape in order to inform the Senate what the House had done.

The veriest tyro in legislative procedure should have known better, and, of course, the employees of the House were informed better by the employees of the Senate. It probably never would have been known outside of the persons connected with it, but I happened to see the original paper with the scrap of paper pasted on in order that the House might tell the Senate what the House had done; and it was not until it was sent back to the House that the proper resolution was prepared and sent to the Senate.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. JAMES. I understand the gentleman criticizes the enrolling clerk of the Democratic House. Is not it true that the enrolling clerks in the last House, which was Republican, made a mistake of several million dollars, and we had to correct it the first thing when this session came into existence? Now, the gentleman might devote some of his time in defense of the Republican enrolling clerks who made a mistake of several million dollars at the expense of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Oh, I might; and the gentleman might defend this. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] himself exonerated the enrolling clerks under the last House for the mistakes which were made in the enrolled bills, and which were not chargeable either to lack of knowledge or lack of diligence on the part of the enrolling clerks——

Mr. JAMES. Who made the mistake?

Mr. MANN (continuing). This mistake is chargeable both to lack of knowledge and lack of diligence.

Mr. JAMES. Who made the mistake of these several million dollars?

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman wants to go on something else. I am——

Mr. JAMES. No; I want to discuss the question, and I want the gentleman to answer my question.

Mr. MANN. I often notice when we try to discuss something that the gentlemen on that side are doing that the gentlemen want to back out and discuss something else. The question here is in reference——

Mr. JAMES. I want the gentleman to simply answer a plain question which I asked him.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will ask a question about this or get my time extended, I will be glad to answer any questions.

Mr. JAMES. We will give you all the time you want. I want the gentleman to answer the question as to whose fault it was that that error crept into an appropriation bill of several million dollars, which we had to correct when we met in special session?

Mr. MANN. It was the fault of that side of the House that held up the appropriation bills by filibustering tactics until the very hour of adjournment [applause on the Republican side], and everybody here knows it.

Mr. JAMES. Why, they were held up in the Senate, were they not?

Mr. MANN. They were held up here by that side of the House filibustering until the hour of 20 minutes to 12 arrived, and they were not yet agreed to in the conference report. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. JAMES. They were held up in the Senate.

Mr. MANN. I know where they were held up. I informed the House at the time, and it is in the RECORD, that if that side of the House——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. That is through with, so far as I am concerned. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri now whether there is anyone now connected with the enrolling clerk's room or the Journal clerk's room detailed from the Printing Office and paid at the expense of the Printing Office appropriation in order to help out this work?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, as far as I have knowledge, there has been no such detail, but if the detail has been made it has been made by the administration and not by this House.

Mr. MANN. Well, I am informed, and I believe the information is correct, that there has been a detail from the Public Printing Office, at the request of the Democratic side of this House or its officials, in order to aid in the enrolling room, in order to do the work of the printing and bill clerk, which office was abolished by the Democratic side of the House, at the expense and being paid for at 65 cents an hour out of the appropriation for public printing, in order to make up the deficiency which you have created in the clerical force of the House under a pretense of economy. [Applause on the Republican side.] I may say that I have been waiting patiently for some days for my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] to publish in the RECORD the statement which was to go in a number of days ago to show the comparative expense of the Republican administration and the Democratic administration of the House. I want to say, now, that when the money paid out of the contingent fund is considered, together with these grossly extravagant investigations being carried on by committees, some of them expenditure committees, over subjects concerning which they have no jurisdiction, it will be found that the Democratic House is not so diligent or so efficient, but is more extravagant than the Republican House ever was. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], nearly every time a bill has been presented to this House that suggests an appropriation out of the Treasury, takes occasion to say that the employees of the Democratic House are incompetent. I want to say that there never has been, so far as I know, a more competent body of officials than are found in this House at the present time. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And the gentleman from Illinois is belittling himself when he constantly draws attention in this House to the little mistakes that men may make. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You may go back during the 14 years that the Republicans had charge of this House, and you will not find from this side of the House any complaint of the employees on the Republican side

There is no man but that sometimes makes mistakes. We have not inquired into the conduct of the individuals on the Republican side, but in the last three or four months this side of the House has come into possession of information which would astound the country with reference to the character and action of some employees that remained in office for numbers of years on the Republican side. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I do not believe it is fair, I do not believe it is just, I do not believe it is right to reflect upon a man that is appointed to office, and who has come here to discharge these duties as faithfully as he can, who may, before he has learned fully to discharge those duties, make some mistake.

Now I want to say again, in conclusion, at this point, that the officials are discharging their duties admirably; that they are men of character, men of standing, men of good morals; and I am pleased to note that, as far as the information has come to us, that we have no employees but what anybody might be proud of. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GARNER. Will my colleague yield to a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I want to ask my colleague what information he has, if any, with reference to the information received from employees of the Republican House by those of the Democratic House or what assistance, if any, the employees who took charge have had from those employees who quit?

Mr. LLOYD. In some instances the employees have been remarkably kind and have been exceedingly helpful. I take pleasure in referring especially to employees Hoyt and Browning. They did everything apparently that they could do to assist those who came into their offices. There were other Republican employees——

Mr. FITZGERALD. What positions do they hold?

Mr. LLOYD. Positions in the disbursing office. There were other employees who rendered like assistance, but numbers of employees on the Republican side—numbers of those who went out—refused to render any assistance whatever. And not only that, but they took out the papers and records, some of which we believe belong to the House of Representatives. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Was the gentleman referring to an official of the House whom the gentleman's side of the House appointed to a place?

Mr. LLOYD. No, sir. He is one, but I did not refer to him alone because there are numbers of them.

Mr. MANN. This side of the House is not responsible for men appointed by the other side of the House over our protest.

Mr. LLOYD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the errors in the enrollment of the appropriation bills in the last session of Congress were not due to any filibustering tactics on the part of this side of the House. A request was made to pass the sundry civil appropriation bill, carrying over $140,000,000 and providing for every service in the Government, under a suspension of the rules, without opportunity to examine or to consider the bill, and I was one of those who opposed any such procedure and insisted that the bill be considered in an orderly way under the rules of the House. If it took some additional time—though thereby more thorough consideration was given to the legislation—that delay was not due to any fault of Members on this side, but was due to conditions which were, if at all to be complained of, the fault of the majority in control of the House.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has referred to a matter to which I wish to call the attention of the House. There has been detailed, at the request of the Clerk of the House, by the Public Printer a proof reader to assist certain employees here. Yesterday I was speaking with the Public Printer about the matter. This man was detailed at the request of the Clerk of the House to aid the new officials of the House in properly preparing copy, which must be sent continuously to the Government Printing Office, and the Public Printer stated that he had inquired what this man had been doing, and had found that he had been engaged in such work heretofore, and that as the session was nearing a close he would permit him to continue for the short time remaining instead of asking that he be sent back now. I know of no just ground of criticism, when it is considered how important it is that copy be properly prepared for the Public Printer, that a man familiar with that work be detailed to assist men who are new to the work.

The pending resolution provides for the employment of an assistant clerk in the Committee on Enrolled Bills for the remainder of this session. It is the program to have considered between now and the adjournment of Congress a number of bills affecting the District of Columbia and a number of local emergency bills, to which there will be slight, if any, objection. When these bills commence to go to the enrolling room there will be need for more than one clerk there. Gentlemen on that side should not find fault with a proposition to provide for such assistants, because at the extra session of the Sixty-first Congress, when the only legislation enacted was the tariff bill and an appropriation bill, not only did the enrolling clerks have two assistants instead of one, as at present, but on the 27th day of July, 1909, the House passed a resolution authorizing the payment of $100 upon the certificate of the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills for additional clerical assistance during the balance of that session.

No fault was found, no criticism was made, because it is a notorious fact that such additional assistance is required during the closing days of a session if there are to be any bills enrolled.

I suggest, in view of the program which has been arranged, and inasmuch as the House will be called upon to consider legislation, and the fact that there is absolute necessity for the aid of more than one clerk in the enrolling room, that it is proper that this resolution be passed. The criticism reflecting upon men new to the service for making immaterial errors should not have any force and should not, in fact, be made.

So far as I am aware, the present employees of the House have done remarkably well. Our party, unfortunately, has been out of control for more than 16 years, and it could not reasonably be expected that new men could be taken and put into any of these positions and serve as efficiently at first as men who have been here during that long period.

I am quite satisfied that the business of the House will be conducted just as efficiently as the legislation of the House is popular with the country. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LLOYD. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if he knows who it was that made the mistake in enrolling the appropriation laws at the last session.

Mr. FITZGERALD. As I stated when I presented the joint resolution to correct the enrolling of the appropriation bill, during the last week of the Congress both Houses were in session daily, I think, from 10 or 11 o'clock in the morning until midnight. The House went into session Friday morning at 9 o'clock and continued in session, except one hour between 6.15 and 7.15 Saturday morning, until after 12 o'clock Saturday. The result was that the employees who were engaged in enrolling bills, suffering from fatigue naturally, were not as alert as they otherwise would have been. Four or five of the large appropriation bills were sent into the enrolling room during the night of the 3d of March, and in an attempt to have the bills properly enrolled errors were made by which certain items were included which should have been excluded. I would not find fault with men laboring under such conditions no more than I would criticize the men called upon to discharge the duties with which they are not familiar. I would not find fault with them for committing errors easily corrected and which result in no harm in any way. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LLOYD. I will now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to my distinguished colleague the minority leader on the other side that the tables he refers to it is true have not yet been printed. But I want to say to him that these tables will be printed. He requested me to give him a copy, which I thought was fair and right that he should have. But the gentleman talks loud, talks earnestly, of the peculiar conditions that exist and of the enormous expenditures in this Congress. I invite my friend to visit the disbursing office of this House and examine some of the peculiar expenditures that he will find during the last session of Congress. For instance—and I do not say it is wrong; it may have been necessary—he will find over $300 paid to the Terminal Taxicab Co. of Washington. I do not know who used the cabs, but I suppose the money was expended in a proper way. He will find there expenditures for special committees traveling over the country amounting to thousands upon thousands of dollars. He will find money paid to some single stenographer to the amount of nearly $5,000 per year. So if you want to go and investigate the expenditures under the Republican administration, I am sure that you will find the expenditure larger and made more freely to all people who were employed by the Government.

You will also find in these expenditures that men traveling over the country gave liberal tips to porters. I suppose that the man who gave the tip each time said that it was a tip allowed by the United States Government. All these things occur in the reports made to the disbursing officer, and when the gentleman from Illinois undertakes every time when a matter of this kind is brought up on the floor to belittle the things connected with new employees of the House, saying that they are incompetent, that we are spending money lavishly, that our report of saving expenses by cutting out offices is not true, I want to say that the gentleman is mistaken; and if he will examine the reports, he will find that it is true a large saving has been made.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD, and I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois in this connection that the reason I do that is in order to print the tables in the RECORD where he may see them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The following are the tables referred to:

CLERK'S OFFICE,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 19, 1911.

Hon. M. D. FOSTER,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: In response to your request for a comparative statement of sums of money paid by the disbursing officer under the Clerk of the House, I beg to submit the following statement of facts, as reflected by the books of this office:

Total of all pay rolls for month of March, 1911, for all persons employed by the House as officers and employees	$63,730.55
Total of all pay rolls for month of June, 1911, for all persons employed by the House as officers and employees (this amount includes the salaries for this month of the bill clerk and assistants and session clerks to committees placed on the rolls in lieu of all other clerks dispensed with)	55,599.44
Total difference per month		8,131.11
Total difference per year		97,573.32
If police force is reduced, as proposed, by dropping 1 lieutenant and 34 privates, it will reduce the roll		39,000.00
If the usual extra month's pay to officers and employees is omitted for the fiscal year, it will further reduce it		55,599.44
Making a total saving of, per year		192,172.76
The amount of the extra month, salaries for March, 1911, amounted to		71,056.29
There was also expended for extra services during fiscal year of 1911		8,987.50
Total		80,043.79

Very truly, yours,

SAMUEL J. FOLEY,
Disbursing Clerk.

CLERK'S OFFICE,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 20, 1911.

Hon. M. D. FOSTER,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: In response to your request for a comparative statement of sums of money paid by the disbursing office under the Clerk of the House, I beg to submit the following statement of facts as reflected by the books of this office:

Total of all pay rolls for the month of February, 1911, for all persons employed by the House as officers and employees	$64,886.38
Total of all pay rolls for month of June, 1911, for all persons employed by the House as officers and employees (this amount includes the salaries for this month of the bill clerk and assistants and session clerks to committees placed on the rolls in lieu of all other clerks dispensed with)	55,599.44
Difference		9,286.94
Total difference per year		111,443.28
If police force is reduced as proposed, by dropping 1 lieutenant and 34 privates, it will reduce the roll		39,000.00
If the usual extra month's pay to officers and employees is omitted for the fiscal year, it will further reduce the roll		55,599.44
Which would make a total saving of		206,042.72

Trusting that this information will answer your inquiry, I am,
Very respectfully,

SAMUEL J. FOLEY,
Disbursing Clerk.

It would appear that the comparison should be made between the months of February and June, 1911, for the reason that they typify normal expenditures for salaries of officers and employees of the House both under the organization of the last Congress and the organization of the present Congress. The pay rolls for neither month contain any payments for extra services, additional compensation, or other unusual purposes.

The pay rolls for March, 1911, were abnormal in that they carried short payments as well as unusual payments. Some salaries paid in that month terminated on the fourth day thereof, other payments made have been for extra services or additional compensation carried in the deficiency act passed on the 4th day of March.

The difference between the monthly average of the salaries of the places abolished at this session and the pay rolls for the months in question must be accounted for by the difference between the monthly pay of persons on the roll by resolutions in February, 1911, and those similarly authorized at this session.

Why should not the credit for saving on account of the extra month's pay be on the basis of the last one actually paid instead of on the basis of the present diminished roll? If the roll had not been diminished, and an extra month's pay was voted according to the former custom, the payments from the Treasury would be greater than they will be for the year by the sum of $221,499.57 in the House alone.

There is printed a comparison between both the months of February and June and of March and June, 1911, and in each case shows the larger increase from the time when the House was organized and under full control of the party in the minority and the party of the majority. I think it but fair that this difference should be noted in these reports. It will also be noted there is an apparent discrepancy between the extra month's pay, amounting to $71,056.29, which is the correct amount as shown by the books of the disbursing officer and by the Treasury digest, and the pay rolls for February and March, 1911.

The Senate paid the extra month's allowance at the close of the long session of the Sixty-first Congress to the Capitol police, and, according to the arrangement of alternating payment by the Senate and House, the extra month allowed for the police force was paid by the disbursing officer of the House at the close of the session on March 4, 1911; so this explains the apparent discrepancy between the larger month's pay roll and the extra month's pay at the close of the last session.

It is not difficult to figure that a saving has been made in the House by the offices that have been abolished, and the extra month's pay in the House and Senate will show there has been a saving accomplished, when this entire reform is carried out, something like $300,000 a year.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois three minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I was not endeavoring to make any undue criticism of the employees of the House. I recognize their greenness in reference to some matters. My criticism is of the majority of the House, which undertakes to place in the control of men without experience important legislative affairs of the House, instead of doing what always has been done, keeping enough experienced old employees of the House to teach the new men. That is what you did not do.

The gentleman from Illinois refers to a taxicab bill. It is easy to criticize these bills. I know what the taxicab bill was for. I have frequently examined the accounts in the office of the disbursing clerk, and by the courtesy of the Clerk of the House I expect to continue to do it.

The taxicab bill was to bring into the House Democratic Members—and some Republicans [laughter]—during the days when the gentlemen on that side of the House were seeking to pass over my dead or living body a lot of infamous claims which did not go through. [Applause on the Republican side.] The taxicab bill was a very small amount to pay for the service rendered to the Government at that time.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. A lot of those were for visits to the White House, too.

Mr. MANN. The taxicab bill was for the 17th and 18th of February, I think.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I will state to my colleague that there was an expenditure for taxicabs of $112 during two days, and the balance of it was scattered along during the term.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. I should like to know if the gentleman can tell us how much of this taxicab bill was for the purpose of bringing Republicans here during the famous fight on the rules when all of you fled to the hotels to break a quorum on that night?

Mr. MANN. The statement the gentleman makes is absolutely without foundation of fact when he says we all fled to the hotels to escape making a quorum. The gentleman knows that he is exaggerating when he makes that statement.

Mr. JAMES. I may be exaggerating, because the gentleman may have been here, but practically all of you did leave the Hall of the House.

Mr. MANN. Practically all were in the House all the time during that fight.

Mr. GARNER. They went away at night. They did not stay here 48 hours on a stretch.

Mr. JAMES. When the gentleman from Illinois makes the statement that practically all of them were in the House all the time does he not know that the roll calls will disclose that his statement is without foundation?

Mr. MANN. I know better.

Mr. JAMES. The roll calls will refute that statement which the gentleman makes.

Mr. MANN. I was here and the gentleman was not here.

Mr. JAMES. I was here all the time, and the RECORD will show it.

Mr. MANN. I was here every moment of the time. I did not leave the Capitol building at all the night of that fight.

Mr. JAMES. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I do not believe he was here all the time.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's recollection on that subject is just as valuable as it is on anything else.

Mr. JAMES. My information is accurate upon this question, and valuable upon all things on which I speak, and that is something I can not say for the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has expired.

Mr. LLOYD. I ask for a vote.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 2983. An act for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Thirteenth Census.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2541. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to prohibit the passage of local or special laws in the Territories of the United States, to limit Territorial indebtedness, and for other purposes"; and

S. 3152. An act extending the time of payment to certain homesteaders in the Rosebud Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 2541. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to prohibit the passage of local or special laws in the Territories of the United States, to limit Territorial indebtedness, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Territories.

OVERSEAS RAILWAY, FLORIDA.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] be permitted to address the House for one hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] be allowed to address the House for one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, several Members seem to want to know upon what subject the gentleman will address the House. I will state that he desires to speak upon the celebration of the completion of the overseas railway in Florida, and the gentleman has a resolution which he wishes to talk about for a little while. I hope that no one will object to this request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to say that if the gentleman from Florida wishes to discuss for an hour the subject of lemons, I would not object. I understand the gentleman from Texas proposes to report in a resolution providing for the consideration of another proposition and debate for four or five hours upon that subject.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Oh, not so long as that.

Mr. MANN. Well, how long?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Three hours and a half.

Mr. MANN. For general debate?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Three hours for general debate and 30 minutes under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. MANN. And several roll calls, and that will take us until about 7 o'clock. I have great sympathy and respect for the gentleman from Florida, and am willing to listen to him at any time, but I do not think it is fair to the House to keep the House here until 6 or 7 o'clock in order that the gentleman from Florida may now consume the time of the House. After the disposition of this other matter, I shall not object to the gentleman from Florida having such time as he desires.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I suggest to the gentleman that there is no necessity for remaining after 5 o'clock. We can adjourn over until to-morrow and complete the matter then.

Mr. MANN. But our experience with that side of the House is that they never do adjourn over when they have anything going on.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do not think there will be any desire to keep in session this afternoon after 5 o'clock. We have plenty of time.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will have an opportunity to-morrow.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. We have another matter for to-morrow that will take two or three hours.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I will be very glad, and am quite anxious, to hear the speech of the gentleman from Florida; but if the matter indicated is to be brought to the attention of the House by the gentleman from Texas to-day, I believe it ought to be brought now, when the House is fairly well represented by the presence of Members, before the hour for baseball arrives, because this is an important matter which the gentleman is to bring in, as I am informed, and there ought to be a full attendance. I have no objection to his bringing this up to-morrow morning.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Of course the gentleman from Illinois does not mean to infer that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] would empty the House. I rather think his eloquence would invite the Members to remain.

Mr. CANNON. I have no desire to make any such insinuation; but I do suggest that when the hour for baseball arrives, that will empty the House double-quick. [Laughter.] I have no objection, if the gentleman will allow his matter to go over until to-morrow, or Monday, or some other day, to the gentleman from Florida proceeding at this time.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. We could hardly agree to let the other matter go over.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have to object at this time.

THE PEACE TREATIES.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in addition to the privilege granted for the publication in the RECORD of the speech delivered by Cardinal Gibbons, at the request of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON], the same privilege be granted for the publication in the RECORD of the speeches delivered upon the same occasion by President Taft, Hon. CHAMP CLARK, ex-President Roosevelt, Andrew Carnegie, and others.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida objects.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, disagreed to the amendment of the House numbered 8, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PENROSE, Mr. CULLOM, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. BAILEY, and Mr. SIMMONS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 130. Joint resolution making appropriations for certain expenses of the Senate and House of Representatives incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, and for other purposes.

PORTRAIT AND FRAME OF FORMER SECRETARY OF STATE WILLIAM R. DAY.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report (No. 121) from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas submits a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 266.

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred House resolution 244, providing for the consideration of House resolution 246, report in lieu thereof the following resolution and recommend its adoption:

"Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to consider House resolution 246; that there shall be three hours of general debate on said resolution, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] and the other half by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEDE-

MEYER]. After the expiration of general debate, there shall be 30 minutes' additional debate under the 5-minute rule. At the close of debate under the 5-minute rule the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution and pending amendments thereto to final passage. The House shall immediately vote on the resolution and all pending amendments."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, let us have the resolution reported.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask that resolution 246 be reported for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 246.

Resolved, That the findings contained in the report of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, presented to the House on the 5th day of July, 1911, and known as Report No. 59, be concurred in and adopted.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentlemen on the other side how much time they desire for the discussion of the special rule?

Mr. DALZELL. How much time does the gentleman propose?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It seems to me 20 minutes on each side would be sufficient.

Mr. DALZELL. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Then, Mr. Speaker, that will be the understanding, if there is no objection.

The SPEAKER. What is the understanding?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That the special rule be discussed for 40 minutes, and then that the previous question be considered as ordered and a vote be taken on the special rule, and that the time be equally divided between the two sides of the House. I make that request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas submits a request that debate on the special rule be had for 40 minutes, the time to be divided between the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman need not provide for the previous question; the rule provides for that.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes; we can do that; but the Committee on Rules thought that we could arrive at it this way and agree to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas submits a request, agreed to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], that debate on this special rule continue for 40 minutes; that the gentleman from Texas control one half of that time and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] the other half, and at the end of the 40 minutes the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, who is to control the time?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is to have 20 minutes and the "gentleman from Texas" 20 minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. We can arrive at it another way——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I understand. I was going to say I shall object unless I shall be given a little time to discuss this question.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, there is very little that need be said to the House in regard to this resolution. The Committee on Expenditures in the State Department have made a report and brought before the House certain facts in regard to matters under investigation by that committee. The resolution which was read to the House a moment ago, resolution 246, has been reported to the House with the recommendation, and it is well enough that it be read in order that we may understand exactly the issue before the House. It provides:

Resolved, That the findings contained in the report of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, presented to the House on the 5th day of July, 1911, and known as Report No. 59, be concurred in and adopted.

I have the report in my hand, as well as the views of the minority as filed with the House. First the House votes on the adoption of the special rule, which simply brings before the House resolution 246, approving the findings of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, and provides for consideration of their report.

When this rule, brought from the Committee on Rules, is adopted, if it should be adopted, the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department simply have their matter before the House, with a day in court to present their report, their resolution, and their argument in favor thereof. That is all that is before the House at this time. I believe there is nothing else that I should say to the House just at this particular juncture, and therefore reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will.

Mr. MANN. Why could not this come up in the regular order?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The committee have arrived at the conclusion that it could not be reached upon a call of the committees and have determined upon this course, and I will state that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] will discuss in detail that proposition, if it should be raised by your side of the House.

Mr. MANN. I raise it now. I would like to have somebody discuss it so that we may have the reasons why it could not be considered under the call of committees.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Then the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] will discuss it at this time. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I was not here when the gentleman propounded his question, but I think I understand it. Of course we are not obliged to carry any such burden as that in presenting this rule. Even if we could under the regular order and by the call of committees reach this proposition, that by no means precludes us from adopting the other plan and presenting a special rule, as no man would be quicker to concede, I think, than my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will pardon me, I think in all my experience in the House the Committee on Rules has never reported a rule for a small matter like this.

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman might disagree with the members of this committee and the members of the standing committee as to the importance of the matter, but the gentleman could hardly disagree with the statement I have just made, that even if this matter might be reached in regular order under the call of committees, still that would be no reason why, if the majority and the Committee on Rules wanted to do it, and the House approved their conduct, that we could not also take it up in this way.

Mr. MANN. There is no reason why you can not do it, because you can do it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I disagree with the gentleman that we can do it under the regular rules.

Mr. MANN. There is no reason why you can not do it, because you can do it. There might be a good reason for not doing it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not agree with the gentlemon on the proposition that it is free from doubt anyway that we can do it under the regular rules of the House.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I am interested in this matter and I am asking purely for information. Is there any precedent for the action which is proposed by this resolution?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman mind stating what the precedents are?

Mr. DALZELL. What did the gentleman say?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I ask if there is any precedent in previous history for the resolution which is proposed here?

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] raises a different question than the one raised by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], but if I have time I will address myself to both propositions before I conclude. In the first place, the gentleman is aware that Rule XIII, which provides what the calendars of the House shall be and how the business of the House shall be worked through the calendars, uses everywhere the word "bills" in reference to what shall go on these several calendars. Now, I concede that the word "bills" is a generic term. It would include certainly a joint resolution, and probably a concurrent resolution, under the precedents, so far as I have been able to examine them, but I doubt whether a resolution which does not propose anything that is equivalent to legislative action or looks to legislative action could be included under the word "bills."

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. This resolution has been put upon the calendar, has it not?

Mr. HARDWICK. I think so; yes.

Mr. MANN. Under what authority?

Mr. HARDWICK. I suppose it was done from the Speaker's desk.

Mr. MANN. It is under the authority of the rule providing for the putting of bills on calendars?

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman refer me to the rule to which he refers? Is it Rule XIII?

Mr. MANN. Yes. Rule XIII provides for three calendars——

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes——

Mr. MANN. The Union Calendar, the House Calendar, and the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is the rule to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. MANN. Under that rule this resolution has been placed on the House Calendar.

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course, the resolution has, so far as the fact is concerned, been put upon that calendar.

Mr. MANN. And it is on the calendar until a point of order is made and it is taken off by the Speaker of the House.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does not the gentleman believe that the point of order would lie against it?

Mr. MANN. No. I did not say I believed it would.

Mr. HARDWICK. By Rule XIII it is provided that these calendars shall be as follows:

First. A Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to which shall be referred bills raising revenue, general appropriation bills, and bills of a public character directly or indirectly appropriating money or property.

Second. A House Calendar, to which shall be referred all bills of a public character not raising revenue nor directly or indirectly appropriating money or property.

Third. A Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House, to which shall be referred all bills of a private character.

Now, the second clause under that provides that—

All reports of committees, except as provided in clause 56 of Rule XI, together with the views of the minority, shall be delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar under the direction of the Speaker, in accordance with the foregoing clause—

So that it looks to me as though only "bills" are provided for, and the term can not be stretched further than to mean, in generic sense, "legislative action."

Now I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I prefer that the gentleman shall take his own time.

Mr. HARDWICK. There are precedents, of course, which include, as I said, any proper matters to be referred, under this rule, to the proper calendars of the House; not only bills, but if my recollection is right, joint and concurrent resolutions.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Simple resolutions such as this?

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman refers, of course, to the precedent connected with the contested-election case about which we talked this morning. I am not sure that that precedent applies to this matter, because we could get jurisdiction of a contested-election case in an entirely different manner.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I consumed?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has consumed 12 minutes. He has remaining 8 minutes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield four minutes more to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] is recognized for four minutes more.

Mr. COOPER. I would like to inquire what is the number of the resolution?

Mr. HARDWICK. No. 246. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has found some precedents which he seems to think are conclusive on this question. I must confess, though I have the greatest respect for his judgment, that I have not had the time to go into it sufficiently, and the one which he cited to me this morning before we took up this matter in the House does not seem to me to be conclusive. At any rate I do not see why we should have to run the risk of having a point of order made and sustained when we can dispose of it more easily by an appeal to this special rule. The gentleman can not contend that there is any objection to getting it up under a special rule rather than by calling it from the calendar, if it is properly on the calendar.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] has called my attention to a new feature of this proposition. The gentleman wants to know if there is any precedent whatever for the action proposed by this rule. The action proposed by this rule is that a certain resolution, to wit, House resolution 246, shall be submitted to this House for its consideration and for such action as the House thinks proper thereon. The resolution itself, in my judgment, as originally drawn is absolutely without a precedent in the whole history of this Government. That, however, would not necessarily be a controlling reason against its adoption, because I am not a slave, and I am sure the gentleman from Mississippi is not a slave, to precedents, although when we find that precedents are all against such action—and when I say "precedents" I mean precedents established by Houses of all sorts of political complexions—it is enough to make us pause. The original resolution, No. 246, if the House had agreed to it, would have committed us to an indorsement of findings of fact in a more or less voluminous report of a committee which had undertaken an investigation.

Mr. DALZELL. Is that the resolution?

Mr. HARDWICK. That is the resolution, but I think I am authorized to say, in behalf of the Committee on Rules as well as on behalf of the committee at whose instance this resolution was offered—the investigating committee—that that latter committee has agreed that the resolution be modified. The rule that we present provides for amendment and modification during the progress of the debate and on through it until the previous question is ordered. It would simply present to the House this concrete proposition, as to whether or not the House of Representatives in the exercise of its undoubted rights and in accordance with more than one precedent that can be cited, will recommend to the President of the United States that certain officers in one of the executive departments shall be discharged from the public service. There is precedent for that.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I suggest that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] use some of his time.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I had a notice this morning of the meeting of the Committee on Rules, but was unable to attend——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important matter, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently the point of order is well taken.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Ames	Faison	Langley	Pujo

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and sixty-nine Members have answered to their names—a quorum.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were reopened.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, although I had notice of a meeting of the Committee on Rules this morning, I was unable to attend on account of engagements elsewhere with another committee appointed by this House. Had I been present at the meeting of the committee, I should certainly have voted against the reporting of this resolution. I should have voted against it for several reasons. First, because of the extraordinary character of the resolution itself; and secondly, because of the extraordinary character of everything connected with this investigation leading up to the resolution from the time of its inception down to the present moment.

The Committee on Expenditures in the Department of State consists of seven Members, and when the House ordered that committee to investigate matters connected with the administration of the State Department it expected those seven Members to devote their energies to that purpose. Instead of that, they appointed a small subcommittee for the express purpose, as will appear to anyone who gives the subject any thought, of having on the committee as few Republicans as possible.

In the course of their investigations they made a report on the 12th day of July, 1911. Instead of pursuing the ordinary course and submitting a report to go upon the calendar of the House, to be open to examination by all the Members of the House, the recommendation was made by the committee that this report should lie on the table. It is lying on the table to-day, beyond the reach of this House by any motion known to us in our parliamentary procedure.

I apprehend that the reason why these gentlemen took this course with respect to the report was because they cared very little about the effect the report should have upon the House of Representatives if only they could secure a sensation in the newspapers of the United States. Because we find that a very few days before the report was submitted, the report having been submitted July 5, 1911, the Washington Herald of June 29, 1911, published the following, apparently by authority:

According to the present plan, no resolution calling upon the President to comply with the recommendation of the committee will be introduced immediately. The report will be printed as a public document, and Chairman HAMLIN, it is understood, will ask that it lie on the table. If, however, after a reasonable time has elapsed, President Taft fails to instruct Secretary Knox to dismiss Mr. Morrison and Col. Michael, a resolution intended to bring such action to pass will be introduced. In the event that the House passes this resolution and that President Taft still refuses to comply with the request, impeachment proceedings will be instituted at once.

Now, what is this resolution that we are asked to consider? It is that the findings contained in the report of the committee to investigate the State Department, presented to the House on July 5, 1911, and known as Report No. 59, be concurred in and adopted. That is to say, this report, substantially covering I do not know how many hundreds of pages of testimony and covering five or six pages of report, is asked to be adopted and concurred in by this House without any further examination than can be given by a limited debate of two or three hours in the House. It embodies findings of fact; it embodies findings of law; it embodies, above all things, an infamous attack upon the memory of John Hay, the greatest American diplomatist of our generation [applause on the Republican side], as pure a man as ever occupied public office, as cultured and scholarly and as able a man as ever was known to American literature or American diplomacy. [Applause on the Republican side.] In this resolution, over the heads of two men who are simply made dummies for the purpose, this man is accused virtually of having stolen from the Treasury of the United States $1,600!

In the course of their investigation these gentlemen found away back in 1904 that John Hay, Secretary of State, authorized the issue of a voucher for $2,450 without specifying in particular the objects for which the money was to be used, as he had a right to do, and as is customary oftentimes under the law in the administration of the Department of State. The uncontradicted testimony—and I challenge denial—is that that $2,450 was paid into the hands of John Hay; that $850 of that money, in his presence, was devoted to the payment for a portrait of ex-Secretary of State Day.

That the balance of the $2,450—$1,600—went into the custody of John Hay, Secretary of State, and that the $850 memorandum that was placed upon that voucher, as it was submitted to the committee on investigation, was placed there by Mr. Morrison, the disbursing clerk of the State Department, after the money had been paid, after it was in the hands of the Secretary of State, and after the $850 had been assigned for this purpose. Now, upon those undisputed facts, upon that uncontradicted testimony, the committee comes in here, and because not even partisan malice, not even the contemptible littleness of the members of that committee, gave them courage to assail the character of John Hay, they come in and recommend that Mr. Michael, who was the chief clerk of the State Department, and Mr. Morrison, who was the disbursing clerk of the State Department, shall be dismissed by the President of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I have not the time to dwell upon this matter as I would like to. My fellow members upon the committee desire some time, but that I may express myself upon the RECORD I want to adopt here and now as my language some of the language of the report of the minority of the committee, to this effect:

"The report of the majority of the committee is a weak, partisan effort to make scandal. It is an attempt to besmirch the memory of one of our greatest Secretaries of State, the late John Hay, whose shining character and unfailing fairness are in marked contrast with the report of the committee, but whose probity stands too high to be reached by partisan prejudice.

"The effort to condemn Michael without a chance to be heard is itself a scandal. It reaches the lowest depths of unfairness. It shows a biased mind which is not seeking justice. It is assassination of character from behind.

"Nor is there a particle of evidence of wrongdoing on the part of Morrison."

In fact, I consider "the report of the majority a greater reflection upon the fairness and intellectual integrity of those who made it than it is upon the honesty of those whom it condemns."

I take it "that the majority report is only an evidence of a partisan intention to accuse officials under Republican administration of dishonest conduct, regardless of facts and evidence. The intention is to make mud and throw it, hoping that some will stick." I protest "against the methods of carrying on the investigation and pronounce the report as subversive of common fairness and the ordinary rights of persons accused of crime."

Mr. Speaker, to what the majority report say of the present Secretary of State I pay no attention. His character and standing and efficiency and record are beyond the assaults of any member of the investigating committee making that report. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN].

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt to answer the gentleman upon the merits of this matter at this time, because if the resolution be adopted there will be time given for the discussion of the merits of the case. I only want to say in reply to some statements he made criticizing us because there was a subcommittee appointed that that side of the House had the same representation upon that subcommittee that it has upon the general committee. The general committee is composed of four Democrats and three Republicans, giving us only one majority. The subcommittee that investigated this particular matter was composed of two Democrats and one Republican, the ranking Republican on the committee. In answer to this being a partisan report from the committee, I think it is sufficient for me to say that the report was unanimous, so far as the subcommittee was concerned. The Republican, than whom there is none better in this House, I undertake to say, fully concurred in the majority report, and is concurring in it to-day. One other thing I want to say, Mr. Speaker, and that is that I am not suprised to see the gentleman from Pennsylvania feel the smart of these investigations; I am not surprised that he becomes wrought up; but I am surprised that the gentleman, with the report before him, will absolutely misstate the facts, as he surely has done this morning. He talks about this committee attempting to besmirch the character of the late Secretary of State Hay. I am sure he has not read the report, or he would not have made the statement he did make. The committee made this statement in reference to the late Secretary of State Hay:

Fifth. Your committee think it incredible that the late Secretary Hay either appropriated this $1,600 to his own use, or that he personally, and without the knowledge or assistance of some subordinate in the State Department, used the same in payment for some matter relating to intercourse or treaty with foreign nations, either of which he must have done if the said $1,600 is to be accounted for as having been actually handled by Secretary Hay. The only intimation tending to reflect upon Secretary Hay comes from the letter of Michael, and this we do not believe, for, apart from Secretary Hay's high character, he could easily have signed a voucher for this sum to be expended in foreign relations.

Yet the gentleman stood up and said that we are attempting to besmirch the character of the late Secretary of State Hay, when, if any such statements are in the RECORD at all, they come from this fellow Michael, who said that he turned over that $600 to Secretary of State Hay, and makes that statement after the lips of Secretary of State Hay are closed in death. We do not believe it. All the facts and circumstances dispute the proposition, and on behalf of the committee I want to resent the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that we are attempting to besmirch the character of Mr. Hay. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Texas five minutes remaining.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum of the House present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and it is evident that his point of order is well taken.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 86, nays 169, answered "present" 4, not voting 128, as follows:

Mr. RIORDAN with Mr. ANDRUS.

Mr. LEVER with Mr. SULLOWAY.

Mr. MAHER with Mr. CALDER.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I should like to cast my vote on this proposition.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman inside the Hall listening when his name was called?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. No.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. All right.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I came in while the roll was being called, and my name had just been called when I came in and——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, a quorum being present I desire to withdraw the motion for a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas withdraws his motion for a call of the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has nine minutes remaining and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] five minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. Does the gentleman from Texas have but one speech?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Just one. I think I will conclude.

Mr. DALZELL. Then I yield four minutes and a half to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss the merits of the original resolution, which the pending resolution seeks to bring before the House for consideration. I am opposed to the pending resolution, because I do not believe that the Committee on Rules should be used for any such purpose as is being attempted in this resolution. Mr. Speaker, this original resolution is now upon the calendar, and I think I shall be able to show that it is properly there. It can be reached in the regular and orderly procedure of this House, and, that being so, we ought not to make the precedent of adopting a special rule in a case of this kind.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] undertook to show that this resolution was not properly upon the calendar, and could not be considered by the House except through the adoption of such a resolution as this. I stated at the time that he was upon his feet that I had some precedents to the contrary, and I wish to call attention to them now.

On April 22, 1892, the House was considering a contested-election case, and growing out of that case a simple resolution was reported to the House, and upon that resolution Mr. William J. Bryan, of Nebraska, submitted the question of order:

Whether it would be in order at this stage to move to recommit the report to the Committee on Elections.

The Speaker, Mr. Crisp, being in the Chair, said:

The Chair thinks that motion is not in order at this time. The rule provides that a motion to recommit may be made either before or after the previous question is ordered upon the passage of a bill. It has been frequently held by presiding officers that the word "bill" in this case is used as a generic term, applying to and including all legislative propositions which can properly come before the House.

And he held, with reference to the motion that was then pending, although the rules provided that the motion to recommit could only be made as to the bill, that it applied to a simple resolution. And that is exactly the situation we have here.

Rule XIII provides:

There shall be three calendars, to which all business reported from the committees shall be referred.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I will have to decline, inasmuch as I have not the time.

Rule XIII says:

There shall be three calendars, to which all business reported from committees shall be referred—

And then uses the general term "bills." In paragraph 2 it provides that all reports of committees shall be placed upon the calendars.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there can not be any question but what this rule is intended to afford a means of bringing all business that may be reported by committees before the House, and it has been held in a number of precedents—I have not the time to refer to them—that a report from a committee without a resolution accompanying it is properly called up under the calendar and subject to debate, and a motion may be made under the rule.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that being so, this subject can be properly called up any day at the morning hour under the general rules of this House, and there is no occasion for adopting a special rule. And if we do adopt this rule, I believe it will come back to plague this House a great many times hereafter and the Committee on Rules as well.

Mr. DENT rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. LENROOT. I do.

Mr. DENT. I want to ask the gentleman, if that is true, what objection can there be found to-day, when the House has nothing whatever to do, to hearing the report of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department?

Mr. LENROOT. My objection, Mr. Speaker, is just this, that if we adopt this precedent to-day of bringing in a special rule upon a matter of this kind, when it is wholly unnecessary, when this calendar becomes crowded at the regular session during next winter and the years following, we will be occupying the time of the House upon matters of this kind to the exclusion of legislation really in the interest of the whole country, which this is not. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has four and one-half minutes remaining.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield four and one-half minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON] is recognized for four and one-half minutes.

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Speaker, the resolution that it is now proposed to bring before the House provides for the adoption of the report of the committee investigating expenditures in the State Department. But that is not the question that will be before the House when the matter finally comes before it for consideration.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MADISON. No; I regret that I have not sufficient time.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think the gentleman made a mistake in his statement of the case.

Mr. MADISON. Mr. HARDWICK, of Georgia, stated that the resolution that would be offered as a substitute to this would be something to this effect:

Resolved, That the dismissal of Michael and Morrison be recommended to the President of the United States.

Now, if that is not to be the situation I want to know it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That is to be the situation, but we have not got to that yet.

Mr. MADISON. Exactly.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The proposition is now a certain rule.

Mr. MADISON. Yes; certainly. Mr. Speaker, I hope this interruption will not be taken out of my time.

The question before us will be this: Will one House of the Congress of the United States, a portion of the legislative department of the Government, recommend to the executive department the dismissal of one of the executive department's employees? That is what it will amount to.

If the President of the United States should write to us that we ought to dismiss the Reading Clerk of the House of Representatives, for example, and he therefore recommended it, he would be just as much within his rights as we are in making a recommendation of this sort. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And what would we do? We would refuse to do it.

It is true that Congresses in the past have recommended the dismissal of executive officers—recommended it to the executive department. I do not know what disposition was made of them, but the Congresses that made them, unless they involved matters of supreme importance, were clearly acting beyond their rights.

Gentlemen, this resolution ought to be worded this way: "Resolved, that we proceed to sit as triers of W. H. Michael in his absence on the other side of the world; and in his absence, without opportunity to be heard, that we condemn him and recommend his dismissal from the public service."

Michael has never been heard in his own defense, except by a letter written years ago. He is not here to-day. The resolution that will be offered will institute an original proceeding, whereby we—391 men—will be the triers of the facts and the judges of the law, and will determine the result upon the speeches of Members, supported only, if you please, by the report of this committee, which nobody has had the time or opportunity to examine. We will be the judges to determine whether or not we will recommend that he be driven from the public service in disgrace. It is a matter of the utmost importance to him and to Morrison.

John Hay's fame is secure.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. MADISON. I regret that I can not in the minute that is left to me. John Hay's fame is secure. No man now, in the light of his magnificent career, can besmirch it. The darts of slander can not reach that pure character. But the obscure individual on the other side of the world, who will have no opportunity to say one word in his own defense, is the man for whom I plead to-day, and I appeal to the sense of justice and fairness upon the part of gentlemen on the other side not to put upon his trial a man who has not had an opportunity and will not now have opportunity to appear and make his own defense. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] in their speeches have gone beyond the question now before this House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania stated that the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department in a contemptible way had criticized the lamented John Hay. Mr. Speaker, he did not state the case in accordance with the facts. Those gentleman exonerated Mr. Hay, but they did criticize the officials in his department, as they had a right to criticize them if they have committed a wrong.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] refers to the fact that we have brought in a special rule instead of getting up this proposition on a call of committees. I challenge his statement that there is any way to bring a simple resolution up on a call of committees. You may call up a bill or a joint resolution that has the effect of law, but under no precedent can you consider a simple resolution in that way.

Mr. Speaker, I am familiar with the precedent to which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] alluded, and it was this sort of a case: It was a contested-election case, brought into the House as a privileged report from the Committee on Elections, and Mr. Speaker Crisp decided that the adoption of the report was legislative and had legislative effect, and that was the reason for his decision.

Mr. Speaker, we all understand that this House is near adjournment, that in a short while this special session will close. [Applause on the Republican side.] You gentlemen may applaud, but we will be back here early in the winter and continue to pass good laws that the American people will approve. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, Mr. Speaker, we chose this method of bringing the matter in; to-morrow we will take up some other matters of importance, different from this, and the next day something else, and the next day something different, whatever the Democratic Party see proper to bring before the House for consideration.

Mr. Speaker, the plain proposition is, Shall this special rule be adopted and give these gentlemen an opportunity to try their issue? If they can not sustain their case, then it is with the committee; it is for the Democratic majority to say whether they can do so or not.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Has the committee the legal right to try a man and impeach him?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That is a question that we will decide when we get to it. The proposition now is whether we shall adopt this special rule and consider the case. Some gentlemen say there is no precedent for calling on the President to remove an officer or an employee of the Government in such a case as this. Will the gentlemen accept precedents made by their own party?

Mr. HINDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. No; I have not the time to yield. Let me cite three precedents for the edification of gentlemen on that side and see what they have to say in reply. Here is one where this House, on March 27, 1867, called on the President to remove the collector of the port of New York, Henry A. Smythe, and adopted the resolution. Here is a case where this House, upon the motion of John A. Logan, called upon the President to remove a commander of the United States Navy, John H. Upshur, and adopted the report. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And I submit a case where the House, by resolution, called for the removal of "an examiner in the Patent Office"—Gen. A. Schoepi. Talk about precedents! This House has the authority to originate investigations, and whenever it unearths fraud and corruption, we have the right to call on the executive department to remove the guilty culprits. This rule should be adopted. The country is entitled to a public trial of the issues here in this forum.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired; all time has expired. The question is, Shall this rule be adopted?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—141 ayes and 101 noes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 146, nays 107, answered "present" 9, not voting 123, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. ADAMSON with Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota.

Mr. LLOYD with Mr. BINGHAM.

Mr. MCDERMOTT (in favor) with Mr. LONGWORTH (against).

Mr. AYRES with Mr. BARCHFELD.

Mr. CANDLER with Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota.

Mr. CANTRILL with Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota.

Mr. CARLIN with Mr. GILLETT.

Mr. CURLEY with Mr. COPLEY.

Mr. DUPRE with Mr. GUERNSEY.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE with Mr. FOCHT.

Mr. KITCHIN with Mr. CRUMPACKER.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky with Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts.
Mr. LEE of Georgia with Mr. WILSON of Illinois.
Mr. LEE of Pennsylvania with Mr. VREELAND.
Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina with Mr. PRAY.
Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey with Mr. PRINCE.
Mr. SULZER with Mr. HARTMAN.
Mr. WEBB with Mr. HAWLEY.
Mr. GREGG of Texas with Mr. JACKSON.
Mr. GUDGER with Mr. KNOWLAND.
Mr. ROUSE with Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin.
Mr. DAY with Mr. PORTER.
Mr. HAMILL with Mr. PLUMLEY.
Mr. TUTTLE with Mr. MURDOCK.
Mr. THAYER with Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota.
Mr. CONNELL with Mr. SELLS.
Mr. STACK with Mr. ANTHONY.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask if the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MCDERMOTT, is recorded?

The SPEAKER. He is not recorded.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then I desire to withdraw my vote and to vote present.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that where the words "from Michigan, Mr. WEDEMEYER," appear, they be stricken out and the words "from Connecticut, Mr. TILSON," be substituted, for the reason that Mr. TILSON is the senior member of the committee on his side of the House, and he is now present. He was absent when the original resolution was brought in.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the name of Mr. TILSON, of Connecticut, be substituted in this resolution for the name of Mr. WEDEMEYER, of Michigan. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, under the rule, I call up resolution No. 246 for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is before the House.

Mr. HAMLIN. In order to have the amendment pending, I offer the following as a substitute for resolution 246.

The substitute is as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the House that the State Department was not authorized to pay for the portrait of an ex-Secretary of State out of the secret or emergency fund to be expended under the provisions of section 291 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and the House recommends the dismissal from the public service of W. H. Michael, now consul general of the United States, and Thomas Morrison, as disbursing clerk of the State Department.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri offers a substitute resolution, which the Clerk will report for the purpose of having it pending.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman offers an amendment to a resolution which is on the calendar and which was reported from his committee. Is it possible to obtain a copy of the reported resolution to which he proposes to offer an amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair hardly thinks that is a parliamentary inquiry. If any gentleman has a copy of this report, if there is any——

Mr. MANN. There is a report. The calendar says there is a reported resolution. The rules require——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Texas whether there is a report on this resolution?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I understand the report has been made and is on file and has been printed—that is, the report on resolution 246.

Mr. MANN. But where is the printed reported resolution 246?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I did not make the report. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] made the report.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will cause copies of the report to be circulated among Members.

Mr. MANN. The rules require that when a report is made it shall be printed. It has been held that that means a reprint of the bill or resolution.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Here is a printed copy of resolution 246.

Mr. MANN. Yes; that is the original resolution as introduced, but I want a copy of the resolution as reported from the committee.

The SPEAKER. What is the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MANN. I should like to inquire whether there is at the Clerk's desk a copy of the resolution as reported, with a reprint, as required under the rules of the House?

The SPEAKER. Such a resolution is in the hands of the Clerk.

Mr. MANN. I think if the Speaker will look at it, he will find that the original resolution is in the hands of the Clerk and not the reprint required by the rule.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is not necessary, if the original resolution is there.

Mr. HAMLIN. The resolution was reported from our committee and has been printed. I think the Clerk has a copy of it.

Mr. MANN. What resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] if the resolution which the Clerk has is the resolution reported by the Committee on Rules?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The Committee on Rules did not report that resolution. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], as I understand it, has called for a copy of the reprinted resolution which came from the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department and for the report accompanying the same.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN], chairman of the committee which investigated this matter, if the resolution which the Clerk has in his hands is the resolution reported from his committee?

Mr. HAMLIN. It is; and the report is there.

The SPEAKER. And it is printed?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes; and the report is there.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we are entitled to have the resolution that is printed, and when a reprint is made of a resolution it shows on the face of the resolution. If the Clerk has such a resolution, very well. When the House by resolution orders the consideration of a bill or a resolution which has been reported in, it means the resolution which has been reported in to the House, not the resolution as it was originally introduced, and that is shown by the paper itself. Under the rules, when a resolution or a bill is reported from a committee, it is reprinted, and so marked on the bill, showing it is reported from a committee on such a date.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the report be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution and every word on both sides of it, and then read the report, so that everyone may understand the situation.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sixty-second Congress, first session. House resolution 246. In the House of Representatives, July 19, 1911. Mr. DENT submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department and ordered to be printed:

"Resolution.

"Resolved, That the findings contained in the report of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, presented to the House on the 5th day of July, 1911, and known as Report No. 59, be concurred in and adopted."

Calendar No. 12. Sixty-second Congress, first session. House of Representatives. Report No. 63. Concurrence in House resolution 246. July 22, 1911, referred to the House calendar and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, submitted the following report to accompany House resolution 246:

"The committee having had under consideration House resolution 246, which was referred to this committee, recommend that the same do pass without amendment."

The SPEAKER. That which the Clerk has just read is the document before the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, what the Clerk has read is the report. The rules require that when a bill is reported to the House it shall be printed as reported, and it shows that it is printed, and it is the reprinted bill or resolution which is up for consideration by the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The resolution up for consideration is the original resolution reported back from the committee. That is what the Clerk read, and that is all the gentleman is entitled to.

Mr. MANN. Well, the original resolution is never reported back from the committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. What is before the House?

Mr. MANN. That is what we are trying to find out.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has the Clerk reported the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk has reported the resolution that is before the House.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to suggest that the special rule which we have just adopted provides for the consideration of resolution 246, which resolution has been reported to the House from the regular committee, and the Clerk has reported it from the desk, and, under the rule, the House should proceed to consider it, since the rule has been adopted.

The SPEAKER. That is exactly what the House will proceed to do.

Mr. MANN. The question is whether that is the paper that the House is to consider. The gentleman introduced a resolution, which the House has just adopted, providing for the consideration of House resolution 246. Does that mean House resolution 246 as it was introduced or House resolution 246 as it is reported under the rule of the House and printed under the Rules of the House, so that Members may know what it is? I think it has always been conceded that where a rule was brought in for the consideration of a bill which had been reported it meant the consideration of the bill as reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas, as chairman of the Committee on Rules, reported a rule to take up and consider House resolution 246, and the Clerk has reported it, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] is recognized. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. I just wanted to show how inefficient the help is, that they did not know enough to reprint a resolution.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry that gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber have felt inclined to filibuster and delay the consideration of this matter. If the matter could have had its regular course to-day we could have been well-nigh through the consideration of it by this time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I understand that it is the purpose of every Member of this House, especially upon this side, and I am inclined to indulge the belief upon that side, that no person shall occupy any position in this Government whose record is not such as to lead the people generally to believe they are worthy of the trust that must necessarily be imposed in them in occupying those positions. Your Committee on Expenditures in the State Department in the prosecution of its work, with no malice to any living man, with no friends to reward or enemies to punish, developed, not as the choice of ourselves, but developed a set of facts which we believe warrants the dismissal of two men who are now holding important public positions. Before I get into a discussion of this matter consecutively I want to reply to the remarks made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON] a moment ago, which seems to be the keynote of the opposition to the recommendations made by this committee, and that is this—that this man Michael, whom we recommend for dismissal from the public service and who is now consul general at Calcutta, India, has not had an opportunity to be heard in this matter, and that if we adopt this resolution we will therefore be rendering judgment against him without his having had his day in court. I think that I would be as far as anyone from passing judgment upon any man, whether it involved a serious offense or a slight one without first giving that party accused an opportunity to be heard, but I want to say in defense of the action which the committee took that Mr. Michael has had an opportunity to be heard and that he had that opportunity during this investigation. To go back a little, in 1906, when this discrepancy in the Rosenthal voucher was first discovered, an investigation was ordered in the State Department, at which time the now United States Senator ROOT was then Secretary of State.

Mr. Michael's attention was called to the discrepancy, and he was asked to make an explanation. He did so in writing, and that statement is embodied in these hearings; and after we commenced this investigation and after we had proceeded for some time, Secretary Knox sent to Mr. Michael the following cablegram, and I would be glad for every Member to hear it:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 20, 1911.

AMERICAN CONSUL, Calcutta:

Testimony before the House Committee on Expenditures is to the effect that while you were chief clerk one Albert Rosenthal received your personal check for $850, the actual amount of his bill for portrait Secretary Day, while voucher signed in blank by Rosenthal indicates payment of $2,450. Mail immediately full report of the facts and of the disposition of the remainder of the amount of the voucher. Cable substance of report.

KNOX.

Now, this brought to this man Michael's attention specifically the very thing which had been presented before our committee. Mr. Knox came before the committee afterwards and testified. I asked him, as chairman of the committee, this question. I quote:

The CHAIRMAN. Since this matter commenced to be investigated did you communicate with Mr. Michael in relation to it?

Secretary KNOX. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you inquire of him as to his knowledge of the whereabouts of the voucher?

Secretary KNOX. Yes; and it is all in that letter attached; there is his original letter in answer to Mr. ROOT's.

The CHAIRMAN. I mean, did you inquire of him?

Secretary KNOX. Yes; and he telegraphed he knew nothing except what was contained in the letter he had written to Mr. ROOT on the subject some years ago, when the matter was under investigation.

Now, I submit to a candid House if that be true, if he had stated all the facts within his knowledge to Secretary Root in writing in 1906, and when his attention was specifically called to what the evidence had developed before our committee at the present time he wires back to his chief that all that he knew about the transaction was embodied in his letter to Secretary Root in 1906, and that letter is embodied in these hearings, to be read by any gentleman, would our committee have been warranted in bringing him around the globe, at great expense to the Government, when he states that he knows nothing except what is embodied in his letter to Secretary Root?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Did you have that telegram before the committee?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. TRIBBLE. And the committee inspected it?

Mr. HAMLIN. To which telegram does the gentleman refer?

Mr. TRIBBLE. The one that Mr. Knox referred to.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Knox did not deliver that telegram to the committee, but testified he received it and testified to the contents of it.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Would that be legal testimony in a court of competent jurisdiction in the United States?

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to say to the gentleman that we are not trying Mr. Michael with the power to impose a punishment upon him for criminal conduct. I want to suggest to my good friend this, however: I do not believe that in order to remove me, you, or any other gentleman from a public office it is necessary to prove that either of us is guilty of grand larceny, murder, or any other crime before a court. If your conduct or my conduct is such as to forfeit the confidence of the people whom we serve—in other words, if our escutcheons are not absolutely clean—we ought to step down and out, and let some man in whom the people have confidence occupy these positions. I believe, however, this, and I think you will agree with me, if you will be patient.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I am trying to be patient.

Mr. HAMLIN. I believe you will agree with me that you can take the circumstances and the facts connected with this matter and convict Michael before any jury in the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TRIBBLE. One more question. Is there any way legally provided to try him and impeach him?

Mr. HAMLIN. Why, Mr. Speaker, I believe that this House has power to prefer impeachment charges, but we are proceeding with the hope that when the facts are presented before the Chief Executive of this Nation that he will have the good of the public sufficiently at heart and have the good judgment to say to Mr. Michaels, "You must step down and out."

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman states that he believes on the evidence the committee has that this gentleman could be convicted before any jury in the United States. Is the offense now barred by the statute of limitations?

Mr. HAMLIN. I am inclined to think it is.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman know it is?

Mr. DENT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Just let me get through with this.

Mr. DENT. I ask that I may interrupt the gentleman in order to answer the question.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes. I would like very much to have an answer to the question.

Mr. DENT. The statute of limitations barring this offense is three years, and this occurred in 1904.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The offense is then barred by the statute of limitations?

Mr. DENT. It is.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have no doubt that the offense is barred by the statute of limitations.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield for a question?

Mr. HAMLIN. Just for a question. My time is limited.

Mr. OLMSTED. In the report of your committee you say Mr. Michael reported that he reported the money that he received from Morrison to Secretary of State Hay?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. OLMSTED. Have you any evidence whatever that that statement was untrue?

Mr. HAMLIN. I think we have overwhelming evidence that it is not true, and if the gentleman will be patient he will hear of it in a very few moments.

Mr. OLMSTED. I shall be very glad to hear it.

Mr. HAMLIN. The committee was put right up, if you will permit the expression, against this proposition. He said he turned over the $1,600 to Secretary Hay. If that be true, then that is the explanation, and he could not be charged with anything wrong. But considering all the evidence and all the circumstances, your committee did not believe that story, and it does not believe it now.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes. And I will come to the evidence directly.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Michael had no opportunity to meet that other evidence, did he?

Mr. HAMLIN. Which other evidence?

Mr. OLMSTED. These other circumstances which you say caused you to disbelieve the report made by Michael in his letter.

Mr. HAMLIN. Oh, yes. The circumstances I speak of were just his own natural conduct and actions and statements. I can not permit the gentleman to interrupt me now at this point, because I am coming to that pretty soon in the line of my argument.

Mr. OLMSTED. Has Mr. Michael had any notice of the evidence you speak of?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. OLMSTED. Has he had any notice of the later evidence which you say came into your hands?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. Speaker, in order that there may be no misunderstanding as to the good faith of the committee investigating this matter, I want to say that we were not seeking to find these irregularities unless they actually existed. What I mean by that is we were not going around "smelling" for them. This matter came to me in a statement by a gentleman in whom I had confidence, and before I even mentioned it to a member of the committee, much less attempted an investigation, I went to Philadelphia, the home of Rosenthal, to have him first verify the story which had been told to me. It seems to me that the idea of gentlemen on the other side is that my only purpose, or the only purpose of the Democratic members of the committee, is to seek to get something on the administration. If that had been the purpose, I would certainly not have waited until I could go all the way over to Philadelphia to verify the story before I attempted to make it public. But that is exactly what I did. If the facts do not condemn the administration, then I do not want to condemn it.

Now, the facts in this case, briefly stated, are these: In 1903 Michael was chief clerk of the State Department and had been chief clerk for some time. Justice Day, now of the United States Supreme Court, as you all know, was at one time Secretary of State, under President McKinley. Michael wrote a letter to Justice Day and invited him to have his portrait painted, in order to hang it in the gallery at the State Department.

Mr. Justice Day made a contract with Albert Rosenthal, a portrait painter in the city of Philadelphia, to paint his portrait for $850, including the frame. Mr. Rosenthal painted that portrait. It was presented and was accepted by Justice Day and by the State Department. Rosenthal then presented his bill for $850 to Michael. Michael handed him or sent him a blank voucher, telling him to execute that voucher and return it, and saying that he would send him his money. Rosenthal signed that voucher in blank.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman there?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Did not Mr. Rosenthal at the same time sign a receipt for the true amount—$850—less $60 for the frame, and that proper receipt accompanied the voucher that the gentleman speaks of?

Mr. HAMLIN. No, sir.

Mr. TILSON. Were they not found together?

Mr. HAMLIN. No, sir.

Mr. TILSON. Is not such a receipt printed in the hearings?

Mr. HAMLIN. I am going to speak about that presently.

Mr. TILSON. Is it not a fact that the receipt is in the hearings?

Mr. HAMLIN. The receipt to which the gentleman from Connecticut refers bears upon its face suspicion, and that suspicion, added to the many other circumstances, will convince any unprejudiced mind that there has been a great deal of juggling about this matter in the State Department. Why? That so-called receipt bears no date whatever. It recites this: "Received, on the 18th day of January, 1904, $790," and so forth. It is signed Albert Rosenthal, and it is absolutely, according to the undisputed testimony of Rosenthal, false, because he did not receive his money until about the 22d day of March, 1904, and not on January 18, 1904, as the pretended receipt recites.

But the receipt does not pretend to bear a date. It simply recites that Rosenthal received the money on the 18th of January, whereas Rosenthal swears that he did not receive it at that time, and did not sign the receipt at that time, and could not have signed it at that time, because he did not receive his money until the 22d day of March, and, of course, would not have signed the receipt until he got the money.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman again yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. HAMLIN. No; I regret I can not yield at this moment. I am not through with that receipt. That receipt never appeared in any statement made by any living man until after that voucher was so mysteriously found. The voucher, another letter accompanying it, and Michael's statement—all the papers connected with that voucher, gentlemen, bore the filing stamp of the State Department, and you gentlemen who know anything about the methods of business pursued in the State Department know that whenever the State Department receives a paper they stamp it with a filing stamp, showing date of filing, and so forth. All these other papers bear the filing stamp of the State Department on the day they were received.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will yield just for a question.

Mr. TILSON. Was this not a bona fide, genuine receipt, signed by Rosenthal?

Mr. HAMLIN. I think so.

Mr. TILSON. Did not Mr. Rosenthal testify it was, and did he not testify that it was his handwriting upon it?

Mr. HAMLIN. I have no doubt about its being genuine. I believe it is genuine, and I believed so the first time I saw it. But it was not signed on the 18th day of January, 1904. It was evidently an afterthought. Mr. Rosenthal says he does not know when he signed it, only he knows he did not sign it on the day when it purports to have been signed, for he did not receive his money for over two months after the receipt recites that he did receive it.

My idea is that that was signed in 1906, when this matter was being investigated by the then Secretary of State, Mr. ELIHU ROOT.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to go just a little bit further.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HAMLIN. I do.

Mr. CANNON. To throw light on this matter, let me ask on what date was the voucher signed?

Mr. HAMLIN. It was signed on January 18, 1904.

Mr. CANNON. What was the date of receipt?

Mr. HAMLIN. The 18th of January, 1904.

Mr. CANNON. Would it not be the natural thing that the receipt would be signed at the same time that the voucher was, and both practically in the same transaction?

Mr. HAMLIN. No, sir, for another reason. There would be no necessity for signing that receipt after having signed the voucher if it was all one transaction. But the undisputed testimony is that he did not get his money on the 18th day of January. He did not receive that $790 until the 22d of March. Then why would he sign a receipt——

Mr. CANNON. Precisely, because in payments by the Government it is quite frequent, if not universal, that the voucher is transmitted before the money is received.

Mr. HAMLIN. I thought the gentleman wanted to ask me a question.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. CANNON. I just wanted to make that suggestion.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman can make that in his own time.

Mr. CANNON. I am not a partisan in this matter. I am trying to get at the truth.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am satisfied the gentleman is not a partisan. I never saw him show any evidence of partisanship in my life.

Mr. CANNON. I am a partisan and a very decided one touching political matters, but when I try a man who is alleged to be a thief, I am sitting as a juror or a judge. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. May I ask the gentleman from Missouri a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON]?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. When does Rosenthal say he signed this receipt?

Mr. HAMLIN. He says that he could not possibly have signed the receipt until after he received the money, which was not until the 22d of March, 1904.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Does he have any distinct recollection as to when he signed the receipt?

Mr. HAMLIN. He did not. He did not remember the circumstance of signing it; but let me call the attention of my friend from Michigan to this further fact: The sum of $850 was to be paid for the painting of the portrait and the frame. Rosenthal bought the frame of the Fisher Art Co. here in Washington, and he told Michael to pay the Fisher Art Co. $60 for the frame and the remainder—$790—to himself, Rosenthal.

Now, at the time that he signed that receipt he receipted for $790, and then added in his own handwriting, as a postscript at the bottom of the receipt, which was typewritten, the statement that $60 had been paid to the Fisher Art Co., of Washington, D. C., for the frame, indicating that that receipt was signed, as he said it was, after he received his money.

Mr. TILSON. Just on that point, did not Mr. Rosenthal say that he did not know when the money was paid to the Fisher Art Co., but he received his and supposed that the Fisher Art Co. had received theirs, and therefore that was the reason that he made this memorandum on the receipt? Is not that a part of the hearing?

Mr. HAMLIN. That only goes to corroborate what I say—that he did not sign that receipt before the 22d day of March, for he did not get his money until that date.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is another point I want to call to the attention of the House——

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman answer one question?

Mr. HAMLIN. I very much dislike to refuse, but my time is going on.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I think it is a question of great importance.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. For one question.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. In whose handwriting is the date of that Rosenthal receipt?

Mr. HAMLIN. I am glad the gentleman mentioned that. It bears no date. It simply recites in the body of the receipt, in typewriting, that he received $790 on January 18, 1904. But Rosenthal swears he did not get his money until March 22, 1904.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the genleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAMLIN. I am sorry, but I can not do it. My time is too limited.

Mr. OLMSTED. Just for a short question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HAMLIN. I can not do it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HAMLIN. Here is another strong circumstance which it seems to me ought to appeal to the reason of every man here, and that is that on the 16th day of January, 1904, the undisputed evidence is that this fellow Michael went to Morrison, the disbursing clerk of the department, and told him, just orally, to go and get $2,450 out of the Treasury without telling him what he wanted with it, and Morrison went to the Treasury and drew out $2,450 on the 16th of the month. Morrison admits that and his records show it. He kept the money until the 18th of January, when he turned it over to Michael and took up the voucher signed by Rosenthal. Rosenthal swears that he did not get the money then because Michael told him he would have to wait for an appropriation to become available, but Michael had the money in his pocket the very time he told Rosenthal that. Does that comport with the right kind of conduct for an official of the United States? Is there a man here that believes one word of Michael's statement that he turned the $1,600 over to Secretary Hay when he made that statement after Secretary Hay's lips were closed in death?

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. I have not the time.

Mr. NORRIS. Just a question.

Mr. HAMLIN. No; I can not yield. Another thing, Morrison swears that he paid Michael that money on the 18th of January, the day the voucher was signed. Michael—let us take his own story now and see how that pans out. Michael says Secretary Hay took $1,600 out of the $2,450 that was in the envelope and let him retain $850 to pay for the portrait and frame.

Let us grant, for the sake of argument, that that is true. What did he do? Did he go and pay for the portrait and frame? No. Admitting that he had that money in his pocket, he made Rosenthal wait and kept the public funds in his pocket from the 18th of January to the 22d of the following March. With the $60, the amount that was due the Fisher Art Co. for the frame, he carried that money around in his pocket until the following June before he paid them. Is there a man here whose partisan prejudice is so strong that will say that there is no evidence to convict this man of wrongdoing in his official capacity? If this man Michael were fit to hold a public office, he would have paid Rosenthal and the Fisher Art Co. at once.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. HAMLIN. I have not the time. The gentleman will have his own time.

Mr. McCALL. I would like to ask the gentleman if Michael denied——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. HAMLIN. No; I decline to yield. I have not the time. Now, they say in the minority views that this matter has been investigated by Secretary Root, and we ought to be satisfied with his decision in the matter. Just a moment. Senator ROOT came before our committee. That was before this voucher was found—you know, it was lost for five years. He testified that he had seen that voucher. He said it was in two separate pieces of paper, one for $2,450, approved by Secretary Hay, and the other for $850, signed and receipted for by Rosenthal.

A few days after that the voucher was found, and when it was found it was discovered that it was not in two pieces of paper, but was only in one piece, and the whole $2,450 was receipted for by Albert Rosenthal.

Again, he said that the voucher did not show what it was for, and yet there was written across both the face and the back of the voucher that it was to pay for a "portrait of William Day, ex-Secretary of State."

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. HAMLIN. I can not yield, for I have not the time.

Mr. MADDEN. I just wanted to ask the gentleman——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri declines to yield, and the gentleman has the floor.

Mr. MADDEN. I realize that.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to yield to all gentlemen. Of course, I understand they are only seeking to take up my time and keep me from developing my argument. Now, I want to call the attention of the House to another significant fact. Senator ROOT said that he was satisfied, yet he testified that the only evidence he had of this matter was Michael's own individual statement.

I want to call your attention to a man connected with the Root investigation who was not satisfied. That man was Mr. Denby, the then chief clerk and now consul general at Vienna, Austria. If I am correctly informed, he is a brother of one of our recent colleagues here. He was commissioned by Secretary ROOT, as testified to by Senator ROOT, and so states himself, to investigate this matter in 1906. Let us see what he said. Secretary Knox cabled him as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 29, 1911.

AMERICAN CONSUL, Vienna:

Confidential. Testimony before House Committee on Expenditure is to the effect that while Michael was chief clerk one Albert Rosenthal received Michael's personal check for $850, the actual amount of his bill for portrait of Secretary Day, while voucher signed in blank by Rosenthal indicated payment of $2,450.

Mail immediately full report of investigation of transaction made while you were chief clerk. Telegraph if you can indicate whereabouts of papers in the case.

KNOX.

Here is the answer by cable, and I submit to any man in this House that it is exceedingly significant:

VIENNA, May 30, 1911, 11 a. m.

SECRETARY OF STATE, Washington:

Telegram 29th received. No written report was made. Careful preliminary investigation failed to convince the department that criminal charges could be sustained. My report by next mail.

DENBY.

"Careful preliminary investigation failed to convince the department that criminal charges could be sustained!" Why? The man to whom Michael claimed he paid the $1,600 was dead, and no man could dispute it. Mr. Root may have been satisfied that everything was all right, but unquestionably Denby was not.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. I can not yield.

Mr. TILSON. I would ask the gentleman to be fair and to give Mr. Denby's report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HAMLIN. I read the entire message. The inevitable conclusion drawn from that statement is this, that a crime had been committed, but the evidence was not available to secure the conviction, because Secretary Hay was not living. Mr. Denby, in his letter, does not claim they stopped this investigation because they were satisfied no wrong had been committed, but, on the contrary, said to pursue the investigation would inevitably bring criticism upon the administration of an honored man who had recently died, and the incident thereupon was passed over and no official action taken.

Mr. TILSON. Read the whole paragraph.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am reading now from some of my notes. Read it, if you have it there——

Mr. TILSON. May I read the paragraph?

Mr. HAMLIN. In your own time; yes. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut is out of order. The gentleman from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, in desperation to find some plausible objection to the majority report, they complain, and I repeat that now, that we did not give Mr. Michael a chance to be fully heard. I want to repeat that once more. In 1906, when this matter was fresh on his mind, if not on his conscience, he wrote what he claimed to be all that he knew about this transaction to Senator ROOT, and that letter is embodied in these hearings. The committee has absolutely concealed nothing. We do not believe Michael's statement. You ask me why? I answer, in the first place, and I believe that my reason will appeal to every fair-minded man here this afternoon, that the circumstances, as well as the facts, all contradict his statement. I want to say to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], who to-day charged that we were seeking to besmirch and cast aspersions upon the character of an honored man who is dead, Secretary Hay, that he is entirely wrong. I agree with him in all that he said in praise of the late Secretary, and the committee does not for one moment believe that a single suspicion ought to be cast upon the name of Secretary Hay, because we do not believe that he knew anything about this transaction, and that Michael's statement is absolutely false. The high character and standing of Secretary Hay will not permit me to believe that he would resort to the contemptible and reprehensible conduct of drawing money out of the Treasury by the fraudulent use of the signature of a stranger, who knew nothing of the transaction whatever, placing that stranger in the position of receipting for money which he never received or knew anything about, and which would, in effect, be nothing short of absolute forgery. Is there a man over there on that side who believes that Secretary Hay was guilty of that crime? If so, let him stand up.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I believe if there was any man in this case guilty it must have been Secretary Hay, but I do not believe that he was guilty.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the gentleman from Connecticut has the temerity to seek to put a crime upon a man who has "crossed over the river and resting under the shade" in order to protect the man who happens to be living and holding office under a Republican administration. [Applause and cheers on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TILSON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. HEFLIN. Gentlemen can not interrupt the gentleman from Missouri without asking permission of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. That is the rule of the House which is frequently violated in the heat of debate. It would contribute very much to order and decorum if the rule was strictly observed.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, it does not disturb me, except that it takes up my time. Listen. And yet that is exactly what you must believe Secretary Hay did do if you believe Michael's story, and you can not get away from it.

To my mind you can only find one of the following three theories correct, and you must find one of the three to be the true one. I desire to say there is no question about the fact of the voucher bearing the approval of Secretary Hay.

First, that Secretary Hay approved that voucher in the regular routine of business, as he was compelled to sign his name to numerous papers and letters each day, without inquiring or knowing what it contained or what it was for. In other words, as Secretary Knox says he must do once in awhile, he must have unfortunately trusted his subordinates. That is one theory that may be the true one. Second, that when he approved the voucher he understood and believed and thought that all the money mentioned therein was to go to the payment of the Day portrait, as this, I am inclined to think is the true theory. Or, third, that he deliberately used the signature of a private citizen to whom the Government happened to owe $850 to draw out of the Treasury $2,450 without the knowledge or consent of this private citizen. In other words, to make that private citizen receipt for $2,450 when he thought he was receipting for only $850. Then to place that receipt among the archives of the department and years afterwards, perhaps after he is dead and gone, when he had told his wife and children that he had received only $850 for the painting of the portrait of Secretary of State Day, the evidence and record in the archives of the State Department would demonstrate that he had in fact received $2,450, with the result that they must always believe that the husband and father had told them a falsehood. I do not believe that Secretary Hay was a party to anything of that kind, yet I submit in all candor that you have got to believe that he was, if you believe Michael's story to be true. I do not believe a word of it, not one single solitary word of it. If Secretary Hay needed $1,600 to be used in some way for the Diplomatic Service all he had to do was to send an order over to the Treasury and the money would have been forthcoming. He did not need to resort to such questionable tactics. I do not believe Secretary Hay would have required you to sign a blank voucher and then write over your signature three times as much money as you thought you were receipting for or knew anything about.

Mr. Speaker, this whole matter has been shrouded in mystery. The minority views congratulate the department on the reorganization and modernization of the methods of doing business down in the State Department; that things are done different down there now under the Knox-Wilson régime. This voucher had been lost for five long years. They had ransacked every place and could not find it, and said they knew nothing of its whereabouts. Secretary Knox had cabled to India, he had cabled to Austria, in search of information about the lost voucher. Finally it accidentally came out in the committee that the voucher had been found on the floor of the disbursing officer among the waste papers within 6 feet of his chair. [Laughter.] That was according to the modernized, reorganized Knox-Wilson system in vogue in the State Department, I presume. Mr. Morrison testified that the office was cleaned every day, and yet the voucher was picked up, after being lost for five years, picked up from the floor among the waste papers, and no living man could tell how it got there.

Of course, that was the Knox-Wilson modernized way of finding lost vouchers.

I have no doubt under the old antiquated system theretofore in vogue in the department the voucher would have been found in the wrong pigeonhole or among the wrong files, but not so under the new modernized system in vogue there now. It is just picked up off the floor from among the waste papers. A wonderful system, this.

I asked Mr. Morrison if he knew how the voucher got there on the floor and he said that he did not have the remotest idea. "Did you ask anybody about it?" "I asked the fellow who handed it to me," and I said, "Where did you find it?" And he said, "On the floor." I asked him how many employees there were in his department, and he said six. I asked him if he called each one up and asked them if they knew how the voucher got there, and he said that he had not asked any of them at all about it. He came before the committee a few days after that. I thought perhaps he might have made some inquiries in the meantime. I asked him again if he had heard anything more about how that voucher got on the floor, and he said he had not. I asked him if he had made any further inquiries of anybody about it, and he said that he had asked one or two boys in the office. I asked him why he had not asked all of them, and he said he was told not to do so. I asked him by whom he was so told, and he said he had been told by the State Department. I informed him that that was too general, and asked him who in the State Department had told him not to do so, and he said, "Mr. Carr, the Director of the Bureau of Consular Service." He was told not to even inquire how the voucher got on the floor of his office after being lost for five years. They concealed from the committee the fact of the voucher being found for about 10 days. Do you mean to tell me that transaction has been free, open, and aboveboard? Was the department trying to aid the committee to ferret out this matter? I tell you that the whole matter smacks of fraud from the very beginning, and the State Department has sought to conceal the fact from the people of this country.

I have a certified copy of that voucher here, and I want to call the attention of the House to it just for a moment. The voucher is only made out for $2,400.50. Everybody understands that the voucher is for $2,450. Morrison said that he paid Michael $2,450, and I believe that is true; but here is the certified copy. I have seen the original copy, but this is certified under the law. These are the recitals:

Received this 18th day of January, 1904, from Thomas Morrison, Chief Bureau of Accounts, and Disbursing Clerk, Department of State, the sum of two thousand four hundred and 50/100 dollars, in full payment of the above account.

ALBERT ROSENTHAL.

That, of course, was written in the voucher after Rosenthal had signed it. Rosenthal signed the voucher in blank. I think it is nothing but a mistake. I have not any doubt but there was $2,450 paid, but it shows an inexcusable carelessness upon the part of the disbursing clerk, a man who is handling millions of dollars of the Government money each year.

How much time have I occupied, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has occupied 45 minutes.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will get through just as quickly as I can. I want to pass on to Morrison, and I want to say that for Mr. Morrison I have nothing but the very kindliest feelings.

I do not hesitate to say—I think I can truthfully say—that when I believed a man to be a good man, I would not withhold from him that testimony, regardless of politics. I care nothing about his politics. I care not what Mr. Morrison's politics are. I believe that Morrison at heart is an honest man. But I believe, further, that he is wholly incompetent to fill the position that he is now filling. A disbursing officer who handles all the money of a department is the only man who stands between the creditors and the Treasury, and he ought to be strong enough and have force enough before he pays a claim to know that it is both a just and a legal demand. He is also the custodian of all the vouchers and all of the papers on file in his office, and he should therefore guard those sacredly.

Mr. Morrison does not measure up to this standard anywhere along the line. The undisputed evidence before our committee is that he is weak and has been but a tool in the hands of the State Department officials; that he will go, that he has gone, on the verbal request of even the chief clerk to the Treasury, not with a voucher, but knowing nothing about the voucher, and drawn out large sums of money without making any inquiry as to the purpose for which the money is to be used.

This is the evidence in the Day portrait matter, and I call your attention to the evidence on page 182 of the hearings. I quote from the examination of Mr. Morrison on page 182, referring to the Rosenthal voucher:

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know anything about the voucher until you came to pay it?

Mr. MORRISON. No, sir; I never saw or heard of it.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you know you were to draw $2,450 out of the Treasury two days before you ever saw or heard of the voucher?

Mr. MORRISON. I was instructed to get that amount of money.

The CHAIRMAN. By whom?

Mr. MORRISON. The chief clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. By the chief clerk? What was his name?

Mr. MORRISON. Col. Michael.

The CHAIRMAN. I understood you to say the other day that you only paid out money on the order of the Secretary of State?

Mr. MORRISON. Well, that came from the Secretary of State through the chief clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. But you had gone and drawn the money out of the Treasury two days in advance of that?

Mr. MORRISON. Precisely, I did; he told me to do it; I did not know what for at the time; I knew no more about it than you.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you make it a custom to draw large sums out of the Treasury and carry the money with you for days?

Mr. MORRISON. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What did you do with that money on the 16th of January, when you drew it out of the Treasury?

Mr. MORRISON. I held it until it was called for.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you keep it?

Mr. MORRISON. I kept it in the safe.

The CHAIRMAN. In the safe in your office?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you make a practice of drawing money out of the Treasury and depositing it in the safe and keeping it there for days?

Mr. MORRISON. Only as it is needed. We are paying out every day in the week.

The CHAIRMAN. Did Chief Clerk Michael tell you what he wanted you to get this $2,450 for on the 16th?

Mr. MORRISON. No; I knew nothing about what it was for.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you draw a check on the Treasury and take out without presenting any legal voucher or approved voucher or order money whenever any of the employees tell you they want you to do so, for it?

Mr. MORRISON. No; I draw the money out as it is needed.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you ever in your life remember drawing money properly approved by the Secretary, as you did in this case? out of the Treasury in advance of the presentation to you of a voucher,

Mr. MORRISON. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you ever done it since?

Mr. MORRISON. I can not recall that I have.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you happen to do it in this particular case?

Mr. MORRISON. Because, as I said, I was instructed by the chief clerk to draw out that amount of money.

The CHAIRMAN. How were you instructed—orally or in writing?

Mr. MORRISON. Orally.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ask Mr. Michael why he wanted you to do that?

Mr. MORRISON. No; I did not question it.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not question it?

Mr. MORRISON. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ask him if he had a voucher for you to pay?

Mr. MORRISON. I assumed he had.

The CHAIRMAN. I did not ask you what you assumed. Did you ask him?

Mr. MORRISON. No; I did not ask him, because I did not know what was coming. I thought perhaps the Secretary of State had instructed him to do it.

Now, there, my associates, you have a man who handles millions of dollars of the public money every year confessing that he drew out of the Treasury $2,450 on the verbal request of a man conceded not to have the authority to direct him, even in writing, and says he did not know any more about what it was wanted for than I did, and I, of course, knew nothing whatever about it.

Do you tell me that that man is competent to handle the people's money? I want to call the attention of the House just here to one fund alone that he has handled during the last five and a half years, a fund covered with the blanket of secrecy under section 291, the items of which the Secretary of State and the President refuses to give to your committee, which amounts to the appalling sum of $719,475.80, to say nothing of the amount of money that is handled by this man Morrison out of other funds.

Another thing before I forget it. A large majority of those present here are lawyers. Let me make this suggestion to you. You know as well as I do that the only authority that Morrison had for paying one cent of this $2,450 to anybody was the voucher presented to him signed by Albert Rosenthal. That voucher directed the payment of the money to Rosenthal, and not to Michael. Here is the voucher:

(Form No. 217.)

The United States to Albert Rosenthal, Dr.

On account of the appropriation for emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service. 1903.

Date. 1903.	Amount. Dollars.	Cents.
Dec. 17. For expenses incurred and to be paid out of the emergency fund appropriated for 1903 (for portrait of Judge Day, late Secretary of State)----------	$2,450 Approved.

JOHN HAY.

Received this 18' day of January, 1904, from Thomas Morrison, Chief Bureau of Accounts, and disbursing clerk, Department of State, the sum of two thousand four hundred and 50/100 dollars, in full payment of the above account.

ALBERT ROSENTHAL.

Now, the only authority that Morrison had to pay that money to anybody was this receipt of Rosenthal, and his authority was to pay that to Rosenthal, was it not? Why did he pay it to William H. Michael? Michael was not named in the transaction. He had no more right to any of that money than you or I have. Morrison was asked a question as to why he paid this money to Michael. He said he did it because Michael asked him to. Is that the kind of man you want to disburse millions of dollars of the people's money each year?

You can not say that this was the practice down there, for there was another case developed before the committee where $5,000 was paid to Frederick Hale in a way that created some suspicion and inquiry, and which, by the way, is not satisfactory to the committee yet. That voucher was made out just like the Rosenthal voucher. "The United States, debtor, to Frederick Hale, $5,000," and signed by Frederick Hale. Morrison paid that voucher by sending that $5,000 direct to Frederick Hale. He did not pay that to the chief clerk, or to anybody else except Hale. But the money in this particular Rosenthal transaction was paid to a man who had no authority to receive it, and to the man who told Rosenthal, to whom $790 was going, that he would have to wait for his money until an appropriation became available, when the facts were he had the money in his pocket at the time. Now, I submit in all candor, and I say it kindly, that if he lied about that, would he hesitate to lie about what became of the other $1,600? Especially when he could claim to have paid it to a man who is dead?

Another thing that shows Mr. Morrison's incompetency is this. The Hale voucher for $5,000 nowhere bears the approval of the Secretary of State or any other official of the department. There was an itemized statement pinned to the voucher that bore the approval of Secretary Knox, but the voucher itself nowhere bore the approval of Secretary Knox or any other man connected with the department. Yet Mr. Morrison paid it. On the face of that voucher and all others is printed this certificate:

I certify that the foregoing account is correct, and that the prices charged are just and reasonable, and in accordance with the agreement.

(Official designation.)

Now, Morrison could not have overlooked that certificate. Yet he paid out $5,000 of the public money on a voucher that does not bear the approval of any man connected with the department in any way. Do you tell me that he is competent to handle the public funds for the great Department of State?

But that is not all. There were other vouchers that appeared in evidence before the committee, not aproved by the Secretary of State or any one acting as Secretary, but by the Third Assistant Secretary of State, a man not authorized by law to approve them. Yet he paid those vouchers without question.

Mr. AUSTIN. I should like to ask the gentleman what bond does the disbursing officer of the State Department give?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes. I understand he gives a bond of $50,000.

Do you know the amount of money handled each year by him? It amounts to millions of dollars. I do not know just the amount.

I want to say in conclusion that I have no feeling in this matter. I never saw this man Michael. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] turns around and laughs. These little irregularities, such as juggling with the public moneys, do not seem to disturb him. But you can not say that it is a partisan report that we have brought in here, because the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], who has been in this House for eight years or more, perhaps, a man that is as good a Republican and better than a whole lot of you fellows on that side, a man whom I have known intimately for a number of years, for I have been on several committees with him, and if he is not a good man from the ground up he has got me wonderfully deceived, is on our committee and concurs fully in this majority report. He is a man of courage, a man of convictions, and he does not have to go to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] or some other Republican before he knows how he is going to vote on any proposition. He does his own thinking. He is a good enough Republican that he was the first one named on the committee. I repeat that he concurred fully in our report. He was present when the testimony was taken, he participated in the examination of the witnesses, he saw the witnesses on the stand, and I say he has concurred in the majority report in this case, and when you come to consider all the testimony, it seems to me that there can only be one conclusion reached, and that is that this resolution ought to be adopted and that these men are not the kind of men that we want to fill the public offices of this country.

Permit me to say, especially to this side of the House, and to the other, for that matter, that if these investigating committees are to serve any purpose at all they are to get at the facts, and if in developing the facts they develop a condition that requires action by the House to bring it to the attention of the Executive for the interest of the public good, it seems to me that they ought to be sustained as we are asking you to sustain us to-day.

These minority views do not pretend to controvert the facts which we have set up, but they go out of the way to attack the majority members of the committee. They say we have made a weak partisan effort to make a scandal. I think I answered that when I said that the leading Republican member on the committee joined us in the report, and if it was a partisan attempt to create a scandal, he is a party to it. No, gentlemen, our report and this resolution are fully sustained by the overwhelming evidence in the case.

Then they say that it is an attempt to besmirch the memory of one of our greatest Secretaries of State, the late John Hay. That statement is as false as false can be. The report and what I have said absolutely vindicate the character of John Hay.

They say that we have shown a biased mind which is not seeking justice. I submit to every man here, if the facts are as I have detailed them, if the facts are as we have reported them, that that charge is absolutely unwarranted.

They say it is an assassination of character from behind. I would not descend to attempt to answer that scurrilous statement in kind. I have a kindly feeling for my friends on the other side, and I want now, of my own motion, to absolve my friend from Connecticut and my friend from Michigan from any responsibility for the authorship of these scurrilous minority views. It bears on its face the evidence of its paternalism. It was born down in the State Department. I think the only connection that my good friend from Michigan had with it was in a capacity of wet nurse, and he has performed that rôle most admirably. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I have examined this diplomatic child with some care, but I have been unable to determine its gender. I think it is undeterminable. I do not know when it was born, but I am convinced that it barely missed being stillborn.

It simply resolves itself to this, they could not controvert our facts and they seek to divert attention by abusing the majority members of the committee.

Now, my friends, all we ask in this case is a careful consideration of the testimony. When you have done that, we are entirely satisfied. If you want to uphold the committee, all right; and if you want to turn us down, of course we will construe that to mean that you do not want crookedness and graft uncovered and we will naturally conclude that our commission is at an end. We have attempted to perform our duty fairly and conscientiously under the law and the rules of this House. We have developed a state of facts that certainly would warrant the dismissal of these men. We are not asking you to brand these men as criminals. As I said before, I believe that old man Morrison is an honest man; but we say that here is a state of facts that shows that here are men holding positions in the service who ought to be relieved. Whatever decision may be made here, the American people will agree that the report we make is warranted by the facts, and that there are too many men among the 90,000,000 of American citizens whose reputations are such that it would not be questioned to fill these positions, instead of keeping in office men whose conduct is, to say the least, not without suspicion. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEDEMEYER]. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WEDEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, the reference to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], as well as to myself, is absolutely consistent with the whole conduct of this matter, as I will show before I am through. I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] that in the absence of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], owing to illness, and because of the fact that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] agreed with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN], I was the only Representative left upon the committee to protect the administration and the State Department as best I knew. And I want to say now that, although this House adjourned for considerable periods, for three days at a time, from day to day I stayed here during much of the hot weather and went over all of this testimony, investigated the records of the State Department, and I prepared the report, that I am proud of, to which the gentleman refers, and which is the minority report. [Applause on the Republican side.] It is true that I received suggestions from others. I did not attempt to do everything upon my own initiative. I did consult with others. I consulted with the minority leader. I asked for information from the State Department.

I have been confined to my hotel for two weeks owing to an unfortunate accident, and I am out here to-day only because I think it is my duty to say something on this occasion. Yesterday for the first time I hobbled out to vote on the cotton bill. If you gentlemen, no matter what your political affiliations, will follow my remarks to the end I do not believe there is a man here who will vote to besmirch the character of Mr. Michael, Mr. Morrison, or the late John Hay, and I ask you to give me your attention. At the outset let me say this—and it was well developed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania—that though there are only seven members of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, nevertheless the hearings in the Day portrait matter were held before a little subcommittee of three, consisting of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN], the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], whose eulogy the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] has just now pronounced, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT]. Mr. Speaker, I have said this to some of my friends on the other side, and they could hardly believe it, but no attempt has been made to deny it. We of the minority had no opportunity even to know when the meetings of the subcommittee were to be held, and usually learned of them only through the public press, when long accounts of the testimony of the various witnesses appeared, including, among others, Secretary of State Knox and former Secretary of State, now Senator, ROOT.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. WEDEMEYER. Yes; but just for a question. I can not yield longer, for I have a great deal I want to say.

Mr. HAMLIN. Was not the gentleman present at the meeting when the chairman was authorized to appoint the subcommittee?

Mr. WEDEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I never knew that these hearings were before a subcommittee, and the gentleman knows I did not, because I called him up over the telephone and asked how it was that these meetings were held and that we knew nothing about it. [Applause on the Republican side]. I decline to yield further.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEDEMEYER. And when I did call the gentleman up, he notified me over the phone that I would be notified only of the full committee hearings, and that these hearings at which I wanted to be present, those that were discussed in the public press, would be held before the subcommittee.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. WEDEMEYER. I do not. I decline to yield.

Accordingly, although I found out indirectly the date of some of the subcommittee hearings and attended some of them, still in general we had to content ourselves with whatever information we could get from the newspapers and printed hearings that were sent, we believe, to all Members of Congress.

It is true that some of my work on other committees did conflict with the work of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, and some of the meetings I was unable to attend, but I had no notice of the Day portrait meetings. We had no opportunity to cross-examine witnesses, and, as has been said by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN], the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], the only Republican on the subcommittee, agreed entirely with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], and therefore there was not a man there to represent the administration, and I will call attention to some of the testimony a little later.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. WEDEMEYER. I said that I would not, but the gentleman is so persistent that I will yield.

Mr. DENT. I understood the gentleman to say that there was not a Member present to represent the administration. Do I understand that the administration is backing up Michael and Morrison in this transaction? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WEDEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the administration of the great State Department of this country has a right to a defense in this body and anywhere else when it is being maligned and slandered, when meetings are held, attended by only a small committee of three, all of them of one way of thinking, and no notice sent to any man who might represent the administration. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield further?

Mr. WEDEMEYER. No; I do not yield further.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. WEDEMEYER. I desire now to enter my protest against the practice observed in this matter of appointing a small subcommittee to conduct investigations of this kind. If it happens that the subcommittee consists of men all of one mind, then there is no possibility of getting anything but one side before the public. It is unfair in the extreme, and ought not to be tolerated in a great body like this. No one can rightly have any objection to conducting a full, open investigation, to which all members of the committee may be invited. Of course, I understand that there are some details that are attended to by subcommittees, but I do not understand that it is the custom to hold important hearings before a small subcommittee when the entire committee might be and ought to be present—at least ought to be invited.

It so happened that the work of another committee on which I served conflicted with some of the earlier meetings of this committee when other matters were being considered, though I attended the same as faithfully as possible, and was astonished when I learned from newspapers that leading officials of the Nation were being examined by a little group of three men, without so much as notice being given to the rest of us.

The majority report finds that the $850 for the Day portrait and frame was a misappropriation.

The distinguished gentleman from Missouri said there was no doubt but that the paper in question bore John Hay's name; there is no doubt that John Hay authorized the expenditure of $850 for the portrait. That is admitted by everybody. They say that they have as high respect for him as anyone, and yet they charge that the payment of $850 for the portrait and frame was a misappropriation of funds. Still, they say they do not attack John Hay.

As stated in minority views, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and made a part of my remarks, unless there is objection, but which I will not read now, we agree that no voucher is required when either the President or the Secretary of State, acting under the President, desires to use some money for the purpose of intercourse or treaty with other nations, and deems it advisable that the expenditure ought not to be disclosed to the public.

The amount of $2,450 could have been paid into Secretary Hay's hands without any voucher whatever. Had that been done, of course, this matter would not be before us.

And that is exactly what was done, much of the time at least, under the Democratic administration of state affairs.

In President Cleveland's administration, during part of the time at least, no vouchers at all were kept for similar expenditures.

The majority apparently does not distinguish between the "emergency fund" and section 291, Revised Statutes.

Section 291 does not appropriate money, but was enacted in 1793 as a recognition by the founders of this Government that this Government, like any other, must be able to expend money in connection with foreign relations without a detrimental publicity. Section 291 reads as follows:

> Whenever any sum of money has been or shall be issued from the Treasury for the purpose of intercourse or treaty with foreign nations, in pursuance of any law, the President is authorized to cause the same to be duly settled annually with the proper accounting officer of the Treasury by causing the same to be accounted for specifically, if the expenditure may in his judgment be made public, and by making, or causing the Secretary of State to make, a certificate of the amount of such expenditure as he may think advisable not to specify; and every such certificate shall be deemed a sufficient voucher for the sum therein expressed to have been expended.

It is to be observed that this section is general in its terms and applicable alike to any appropriation for foreign intercourse.

Why should it be confused with the "emergency fund" appropriation? That fund was first provided when Mr. Bayard was Secretary of State in 1886. The language of the appropriation is as follows, and I want you to follow it:

> To enable the President to meet unforeseen emergencies arising in the diplomatic and consular service, and to extend the commercial and other interests of the United States, to be expended pursuant to the requirements of section 291 of the Revised Statutes, $90,000.

Then, too, the "emergency fund" is of Democratic origin. It is interesting to note what probably led to the establishment of this fund:

> In 1881, 1882, and 1885 the department purchased several portraits of former Secretaries of State, and paid for them from the appropriation for "Stationery, furniture, etc."; on February 6, 1885, and on July 4, 1885, the portraits of Secretary Blaine and Secretary Frelinghuysen were so purchased.
> Comptroller Durham made strenuous objections to regarding portraits as "furniture," and finally declined to do so, in spite of the department's arguments to the contrary; but, as a compromise, he consented to pass the disbursing clerk's account for the purchase of Mr. Frelinghuysen's portrait upon the provision that no other should be similarly paid for.

Apparently it was to avoid the possibility of such trouble in the future that Mr. Bayard—wisely, as I think—made provision for this "emergency fund."

How unfair is the suggestion that this $850 for the portrait of Secretary Day was misappropriated is evident from the language of the appropriation for this fund, as established by the Democratic Secretary of State, Mr. Bayard, in 1886. Note the language:

> To enable the President to meet unforeseen emergencies arising in the diplomatic and consular service, and to extend the commercial and other interests of the United States, etc.

The Democratic and Republican administrations alike secured portraits to be hung in the room where foreign representatives were received. And it was not a misappropriation under either Democratic or Republican administrations. Surely we must have a proper room to receive ambassadors if we are to "extend the commercial and other interests of the United States." If the upkeep of that room is an indispensable accessory to foreign intercourse, the purpose of which is to "extend the commercial and other interests of the United States," then surely it is a reasonable argument that to keep up to date a collection of the diplomatic portraits, for which no other fund is specifically available, is an entirely proper charge upon the "emergency fund."

That it has been so used for many years was the testimony of Secretary ROOT before the committee. He said:

It has been a custom existing for a great many years, time out of mind, both in the State Department and other departments, followed by whatever party has been in control, to secure for the departments the portraits of the heads of departments. You will find on the walls of the State Department the portraits of every Secretary of State the United States has had, and I think you will find in the Department of Justice the portraits of every Attorney General, and so of every Secretary of War and every Secretary of the Navy and every Secretary of the Treasury. The subject is one which has been before Congress a great many times; it has been perfectly understood that the custom existed, and that the portraits were secured and the payments were made out of the general funds which were at the disposal of the heads of departments; and Mr. Hay undoubtedly followed that custom in securing the portrait of his predecessor, Mr. Day; and, while I can not be certain, I presume the same custom was followed in securing the portrait of Mr. Hay in my time.

That it had been used since 1890 was the testimony of Secretary Knox, page 95 of hearings. He said:

I am told that since 1890 the portraits of the retiring Secretaries of State have been paid for out of the emergency fund; that has been the invariable rule since 1890; that is all I know about it.

It is true that on September 8, 1890, the portraits of John Q. Adams and Henry Clay were purchased from a special appropriation made by Congress for that purpose. With that exception, since 1890 all portraits have been paid for out of the emergency fund.

We find that on March 6, 1890, the portrait of John Forsythe was purchased at a cost of $300 and paid from the emergency fund. This was no doubt done for the reason that under the comptroller's decision the department could not pay for the same from the "stationery, furniture, and so forth," appropriation. No other appropriation was available, and the emergency fund was used, as no doubt Secretary Bayard intended it should be.

Now, it is interesting to note that not only was the emergency fund established by a Democratic Secretary of State, but also that out of this fund the portrait was purchased, October 7, 1895, of the distinguished former Democratic Secretary of State, W. Q. Gresham. This, then, was during the administration of Grover Cleveland. On February 10, 1893, just before the second Cleveland administration, the portrait of T. F. Bayard, former Democratic Secretary, was purchased, and we have been unable to find where any objection was raised to that, nor have we been able to find where any objection was raised to the purchase of the portrait of Richard Olney, the distinguished Democratic Secretary, on October 9, 1897.

The following is a list of portraits of former Secretaries purchased since 1890 and paid for out of the "emergency fund," and date of purchase:

John Q. Adams, January 10, 1901.
T. F. Bayard, February 7, 1893.
W. Q. Gresham, October 7, 1895.
Richard Olney, October 9, 1897.
John Sherman, July 7, 1898.
John Foster, May 11, 1900.
W. R. Day, January 18, 1904.
John Hay, July 20, 1906.
Elihu Root, July 6, 1909.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEDEMEYER. I will not be interrupted, as I desire to complete my remarks in the time allotted me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. WEDEMEYER. Other portraits, including those of Calhoun, Marshall, Madison, and Van Buren, were likewise paid for out of the "emergency fund."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think this sufficiently disposes of the charge of misappropriation so unjustly made against ex-Secretary Hay, because it is under his administration that the payment occurred; there is no question but that his name was on the voucher, and therefore it is his administration of affairs that is being attacked.

In view of all these things it seems rather strange and inconsistent for the committee report to affirm the high character of Secretary Hay. Plainly that affirmation was used as a vehicle for turning suspicion against Mr. Michael, rather than as a genuine tribute to the dead Secretary.

But, Mr. Speaker, happily Mr. Hay's place in the world's diplomacy is too secure to need any empty encomium from men who are trying to reflect upon the general management of the State Department under his administration.

Likewise with Secretary Root, whose disposition of the matter we have already discussed.

No; this $850 was not misappropriated any more than were the other appropriations made from the same fund for like purposes under both political administrations. Neither Democratic nor Republican administrations were accused of misappropriations in these matters when they came up in the past, and we are surprised that any attempt at this day should be made to cast any such reflections upon the distinguished names of men who have held the the first position in the Cabinet under both parties in years gone by.

As an American I am proud alike of Bayard, of Olney, and of Blaine, as well as of Hay, Knox, and Root. I submit that if there was misappropriation it would apply equally as well to Democratic as to Republican administrations, and they ought to be included in the condemnation; but fortunately, as an American citizen, I am glad there is no excuse for any such condemnation. It is utterly without reason, and we are astounded that any committee should suggest it.

Now, a little examination will disclose that the much-heralded charges in the Day portrait matter are equally without foundation.

At the outset it may be well suggested that this matter, which has been so widely advertised through the press, was not the discovery of this committee at all, but, on the contrary, was an old matter that had been fully investigated by Secretary ROOT some years ago, as the testimony of Mr. ROOT, contained in pamphlet No. 5 of the hearings, shows.

That testimony brings out the fact (p. 105) that a communication with regard to this matter was sent in 1906 to Mr. Michael, then consul at Calcutta.

I want to say now Michael was never heard before this committee. Mr. Michael never had a hearing. When the distinguished chairman was asked what was the testimony against Mr. Michael outside of the letter, "Oh," he said, "there were other circumstances and other things." If there were other circumstances and other things, ought not Mr. Michael to have had an opportunity to meet those circumstances and those things? [Applause on the Republican side.] But he never had such an opportunity. Now, I say to you in all fairness, that the only communication which went to him came not from the committee, but from Secretary of State Knox; and I want to say further that the record will disclose that the letter of Mr. Michael that is an explanation of this whole matter was never put in the hearings at all except upon the repeated suggestion of Secretary Knox, as the testimony will show. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question, and that is, in the prior examination some years ago—1896—was Mr. Michael present then? I judge from what I have heard——

Mr. WEDEMEYER. I am coming right to that, if the gentleman from Mississippi will allow me, in just a moment.

Mr. AUSTIN. I suggest to the gentleman that he have the Michael letter published as part of his remarks.

Mr. WEDEMEYER. I will. Now, in answer to the gentleman from Mississippi, the letter of Michael's that came to Secretary ROOT very clearly, plainly, and honestly disposed of and settled the whole matter with Mr. ROOT, who said the matter deserved no further notice and attention. Here is his testimony.

In response to a question as to what the reply contained, former Secretary ROOT gave the following answer:

In substance, that he—

Meaning Michael—

had been directed by Mr. Hay to make payments for several matters out of what is called the emergency fund—that is, the nonaccountable fund—and that those different matters aggregated $2,450, one of them being the $850 for the Day portrait, and that he received the money from the disbursing officer in accordance with Mr. Hay's directions and paid it out in accordance with his directions for these various matters. Now, that is the substance of his explanation. (See Denby's letter, p. 210 of hearings; also see p. 220, showing Loomis's certificate; see Michael's letter, pp. 159–160.)

As showing Secretary ROOT's disposition of the matter, we quote the following from the Secretary's testimony (p. 106):

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what disposition did you make of that report when this information was conveyed to you?
Senator ROOT. Of Mr. Michael's report?
The CHAIRMAN. Of this investigation that you said you had ordered.
Senator ROOT. Well, I became satisfied that the $2,450 was paid out to Mr. Michael with Mr. Hay's approval, and that I had no reason to doubt it had been expended in accordance with that.

The testimony of Secretary ROOT, on page 111, brings out the fact that no receipt is even required when a payment is made out of this fund.

The former Secretary also brings out that lines between different payments are not drawn with reference to foreign and domestic affairs. He said (p. 111 of hearings):

Well, I should think that the lines between different payments are not drawn with reference to foreign affairs and domestic affairs; they are drawn according to the distinctions between appropriations. If there were two payments to be made out of this particular appropriation, which is called the emergency fund, they might well be made under one direction, one order, or warrant from the Secretary of State, even though one of them related to foreign affairs and one to domestic affairs—that is, so far as domestic affairs come under the State Department, the lines being drawn on appropriation lines.

As to taking papers from the files, the testimony of Senator ROOT, on page 112, is of interest:

Mr. DAVIS. Is it the custom for an officer having charge of vouchers to allow them to be taken from the files?

Senator ROOT. Well, I suppose so, if they are wanted in the department. It depends on what you mean by taking them from the files. Do you mean taking them away from the particular place of deposit?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; and keeping them for several days at a time.

Senator ROOT. Oh, that would frequently happen, undoubtedly.

Mr. DAVIS. Is not that done only upon the direction of the head of the department—for instance, of the Secretary of State?

Senator ROOT. Oh, no.

Mr. DAVIS. Has the chief clerk, for instance, a right to go to the disbursing officer and demand these vouchers out of his possession?

Senator ROOT. I should say yes.

Mr. DAVIS. You think he has?

Senator ROOT. I should think so; yes. I have never known any question to be raised about it. The papers which are in the files are in frequent use, are frequently called for by the various branches of the department, and certainly I have no doubt that the chief clerk would be entitled to send for papers from those files. Probably the practice would require a note to be made in some way and put with the file, to show that the papers went into the hands of the chief clerk.

Further, the testimony of the former Secretary, on pages 113 and 114 of the hearings, is of interest.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Let me ask the gentleman for information. As I understood the statement of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN], Mr. Michael had had his day in court at a former investigation. I want to know now if he was present at the former investigation or if he was simply written to and made a written reply?

Mr. WEDEMEYER. Let me say this. I take it that he was not present because his explanation by letter did not even make it necessary that he should come.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Where was he?

Mr. WEDEMEYER. He was over in Calcutta at that time. Of course, if Secretary Root had concluded anything was suspicious he would not have found him guilty and discharged him without a personal hearing, but there was no need for it, because the letter cleared up the whole matter. Do you see the reason for that? You will see it when I read Michael's letter. His letter says that his impression was that the remaining money was expended in connection with Chinese matters; and of course the portrait was a domestic matter. If the Secretary wished to, he could combine the two in that voucher.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEDEMEYER. No; I will not.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. The gentleman need not be so afraid of me.

Mr. WEDEMEYER. I want to say in deference to the gentleman, because he did interrupt me before, that I have patiently and carefully examined this matter, and I want to bring the facts before the House, and when I am through, if there is any time, I will be very glad to answer the gentleman or anyone else.

Now, here we come to the hearings, and if you will follow me you will see how fair and reasonable the explanation is:

The CHAIRMAN. Senator, if this $1,600, the difference between the $850 paid Rosenthal and the $2,450 drawn from this fund, was paid out for other purposes, would there not be vouchers for those payments?

Senator ROOT. Not necessarily; no.

Hay is the only man who did know, and if he wanted to keep it to himself it was not to be expected that he went around and told his subordinates what he did.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mean to state that this fund will be paid out without any receipt being taken or any memorandum being made showing how it is paid out?

Senator ROOT. Yes; it might well be paid out without any receipt being taken; that is a matter that is committed by law to the Secretary of State.

The CHAIRMAN. But this certificate that the Secretary of State, or the President through the Secretary of State, is permitted to make, throwing the veil of secrecy over this expenditure, would, under the law, cover only certain things that ought to be kept secret. Is not that true?

Senator ROOT. I suppose; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, then, if this money should be paid for some things that ought not to be kept secret, or about which there is no necessity for secrecy, how is the Secretary to know, if there is no memorandum made of the payment or voucher taken, to whom the payments have been made or for what purposes they were made?

Senator ROOT. I suppose the Secretary must know what has been paid and know what the money is expended for.

The CHAIRMAN. He would know that by vouchers that would be taken at the time the payment was made, would he not?

I want you to notice the answer of Senator ROOT:

Senator ROOT. Well, he would know it if vouchers were taken, but there may well be payments made, and there are payments made, for which no vouchers could well be taken. I suppose that perhaps the most important of the payments that would be made out of what you may call a secret fund would be payments that would be made without vouchers.

The CHAIRMAN. Would they be made through the chief clerk?

Senator ROOT. They might be; they might be made through anybody whom the Secretary of State selected to make the payments.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the chief clerk, who has charge of the local office here, the usual medium through whom these payments are made for which no vouchers are taken?

Senator ROOT. You can not say that he is the usual medium or that anybody is, because those things are not frequent enough to establish a custom. You can well understand that there are very different conditions at different times. During Mr. Hay's time we were just closing up the War with Spain, and undoubtedly there were many payments being made during that period—during the period of the war and succeeding the war—for which no vouchers would be taken. Coming along down to my time, in the summer of 1905, we had entered upon new conditions, and I do not recall any payment in my time for which a voucher might not be taken, though there may have been.

There is nothing strange about Michael acting in the matter—not at all. The Secretary of State is not attending to these details. That is what he has a clerk for.

The majority report finds that Morrison, as disbursing clerk, on the verbal request of Chief Clerk Michael, drew a warrant on the Treasury Department for the sum of $2,450. This warrant for $2,450 was cashed through one of the messengers of the disbursing bureau January 16, 1904, the majority state, and the money deposited in the safe in Morrison's office, where it remained until January 18, 1904, when Morrison delivered the said money to Michael, taking no receipt, but relying alone on the voucher signed by Rosenthal. This voucher Mr. Rosenthal had apparently signed in blank.

Right here the chairman says that the voucher bears the name of John Hay—the voucher for $2,450. There was some talk about those dollars. I was not in the committee to hear the testimony, but $2,450 was what it was intended to be.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. WEDEMEYER. No; I will not.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. WEDEMEYER. No.

Mr. HAMLIN. I just wanted to ask a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. WEDEMEYER. Mr. Morrison's testimony, page 128, showed that the $2,450 was paid in cash. The voucher was approved by Secretary Hay.

The letter of Mr. Michael shows that no receipt on the voucher by Rosenthal was ever intended. All that was needed from him was an ordinary receipt, which was actually given, though there was great attempt to cloud that whole matter in much mystery. This receipt is to be found on page 214 of the hearings.

Now, right at this point, is it reasonable to suppose that if Michael or Morrison intended to commit any wrong that they would have one voucher signed for $2,450 and in the same bundle of papers have a receipt for the same thing signed for $850 in all? Of course not. The receipt was all that was intended, and nothing else was intended.

I want to say to you, as Members of the House know, I am a new Member here. I have been suffering from an illness these few weeks, and I hope that in the opening of my remarks in my overzealousness I have said nothing that was at all wrong with regard to the other members of the committee. I have been simply trying to state the facts, and I comment upon the committee only as this is necessary in order to throw light upon their attitude in this matter.

In this connection the following incidents are worthy of notice:

When the papers in the Day portrait case were finally found and placed before the committee by Secretary Knox, there appeared among them a receipt signed by Mr. Rosenthal for $790, the exact amount due him for the portrait, with a postscript in his handwriting to the effect that the amount did not include the frame for the portrait, for which Mr. Fischer received $60 directly from the department. This receipt appears to have been with the papers in the case when they were found.

That was his receipt, and that was the only receipt that should ever have been given. The signing of the $2,450 voucher by Rosenthal was an inadvertence. No voucher at all was necessary. Mr. Hay had withdrawn that $2,450, and no voucher was needed upon his certificate, according to a long-established practice. No vouchers were considered necessary during a large portion of President Cleveland's administration for secret payments.

The preposterous theory was suggested that the Rosenthal receipt had been prepared after the committee's investigation had begun. Page 154:

Secretary KNOX. What do you suspect, Mr. HAMLIN, that somebody is trying to commit perjury here or bring you a forgery?

The CHAIRMAN. I am not accusing anybody, but I am of the opinion that that receipt was prepared recently.

The Secretary pronounced the theory absurd, and in response to his inquiries it was admitted that the signature and note upon the receipt were unquestionably in Mr. Rosenthal's handwriting. Secretary Knox thereupon suggested that Mr. Rosenthal be subpœnaed to testify in regard to the receipt.

The morning Mr. Rosenthal was to testify in regard to this receipt, namely, June 21, 1911, one of the Washington papers, the Washington Herald, I believe it was, published a statement under sensational headlines to the effect that Mr. Rosenthal would repudiate the "mysterious" receipt and deny that he had written or signed it.

But when Mr. Rosenthal appeared before the committee a few hours later and was shown the receipt in question, he not only testified that it had been signed by him, but that the postscript had been written by him before or at the time he received payment for the portrait.

Further, the majority report shows:

At that time, according to the testimony of Morrison, there was nothing on the voucher to indicate the purpose for which this sum was to be utilized. After paying over this money to Michael and returning to his office, the said Morrison, within 30 minutes, caused a clerk in his office to write with pen and ink, in parentheses, on the voucher, the following: "For the portrait and frame of ex-Secretary Day." The said Morrison testified before your committee that he caused this memorandum on the voucher to be made for his own protection.

Mr. Morrison can not be supposed to have known what the whole $2,450 was spent for. From what he learned he apparently thought it was all to go for the portrait and frame, and accordingly had it so indicated. Of course it was to go for the portrait and frame in part and for other matters, also. His testimony, however, is perfectly clear and straightforward and shows how the reference to the Day portrait came to appear on the voucher.

The majority report further shows that Michael reported in 1906 that he had paid this money received from Morrison—by which, of course, reference is had to the $2,450—to Secretary Hay; and while he did not know, he presumed that he used the difference "in relation to the emergency fund authorized by section 291 of the Revised Statutes for some item or items relating to foreign affairs."

This statement is followed by the highly unnecessary comment that at the time Michael made his statement Secretary Hay was dead. Of course, had ex-Secretary Hay been living the facts would have been obtained from him, as he apparently was the one man who knew exactly the purpose for which the remaining $1,600 was expended, because it was a secret expenditure and one that he had a right to make.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. WEDEMEYER. No; I can not yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield. The gentleman from Michigan is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WEDEMEYER. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I had nothing to do with the limiting of time. That was done by the House. Unfortunately, there are a lot of ramifications in this matter, and I decline to yield, not because I do not want full discussion, but because of pressure of time. I believe that a full discussion of this matter, a discussion full enough and thorough enough, would result in the defeat of this resolution.

The majority report should have given the entire letter of Mr. Michael, which plainly clears up the whole matter. Here is the letter:

Confidential.]

CALCUTTA, INDIA, May 7, 1906.

Hon. ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Your letter of the 28th of March was received in last Sunday's mail—the last mail from the United States—and my answer thereto goes forward by the first outward mail.

You call my attention to a "voucher bearing No. 228, unaccompanied by a bill or other memoranda, for the sum of $2,450 * * * for expenses incurred and to be paid out of the emergency fund appropriated for 1903, under which is written in ink in parentheses (for portrait of Judge Day, late Secretary of State), * * * duly signed by Albert Rosenthal, dated January 18, 1904.

"As this amount is greatly in excess of the sum paid by the department for other similar portraits, and as it also seems in excess of the figure which this artist is accustomed to receive for his work, the department would be forced to the conclusion that the voucher signed by Rosenthal was actually made out to cover a number of emergency payments, of which the portrait was only one, were it not that the voucher was signed by Rosenthal alone.

"You are requested to state, as far as you can from memory, exactly what was paid for the portrait in question, how it was paid, whether by cash or otherwise, and to indicate what other expenditures, if any, are included in the gross sum of the voucher, and any other explanatory facts within your knowledge."

In reply I have the honor to say that the price paid for the portrait, as nearly as I can now recall, was $750. Whether this includes the cost of the frame, I am unable to say.

My memory is not clear as to how payment was made. I am inclined to think, however, by drafts.

The price paid for the portrait was, I believe, agreed upon between ex-Secretary of State Day and Mr. Rosenthal. I was directed by Secretary Hay to write to Judge Day and ascertain whether the portrait was entirely satisfactory to him and the price agreed upon. In reply to my letter Judge Day said the portrait was satisfactory to him, and stated the price to be paid. This letter I handed to Secretary Hay. He took a memorandum out of his portfolio and, after looking at it, directed me to make out a voucher for a certain amount—I do not now recall the amount—to pay for the portrait, and to hand him the balance, which he desired to apply on other emergency accounts. He did not say what the accounts were, and the only impression I got was that they related in some way to Mr. Rockhill in connection with Chinese affairs.

The amount of the voucher—whatever it was—was delivered to me by some one from the Bureau of Accounts, according to my recollection. The price of the portrait was taken out of the envelope containing the money in the presence of Secretary Hay, who retained the balance.

The voucher was to be signed by me, and not Mr. Rosenthal. If he signed the voucher instead of a receipt it was through error. There was no such purpose. If the voucher was sent to him to sign it was by inadvertence; and it seems to me unaccountable that he should have signed such a voucher if it had been sent to him. He was paid in full for the portrait, I am quite sure.

Whatever was done in the premises was done by direction of Secretary Hay, as nothing could have been done otherwise; and if there is anything in the transaction open to criticism it is the error of sending to the artist a voucher which was not intended for his signature at all and which he should not have signed.

With respect, I have the honor to be,
Your most obedient servant,
WM. H. MICHAEL.

We submit that this makes the whole transaction perfectly clear; and still, such was the attitude of the subcommittee that this letter was only included in the printed hearings, after repeated suggestions from Secretary Knox (p. 158).

That is all there is to the whole matter.

Mr. NORRIS. That letter of Mr. Michael's was written from Calcutta?

Mr. WEDEMEYER. Yes; written from Calcutta, India. Here was a voucher for $2,450. It is of date January 18, 1904, and was signed by John Hay. Eight hundred and fifty dollars was paid to Mr. Rosenthal for the Day portrait, less the $60 for the frame. According to Mr. Michael's testimony—and there is nothing in the world to contradict it—the remaining $1,600 was expended by Secretary Hay for emergency affairs. That is all there is to it, and it is impossible to distort the testimony so as to make anything else out of it. The signing of the voucher for $2,450 by Mr. Rosenthal was an inadvertence. That is shown by the fact that an ordinary receipt was sent to Mr. Rosenthal. Surely a voucher for $2,450 and a receipt for $850 covering the same item would not be secured in the same transaction by men who were trying to steal money.

The proper voucher was signed by the Secretary of State when no voucher at all was necessary. Morrison paid over the $2,450 in cash to Michael, which tallies exactly with the statement of Michael, that the amount for the portrait was taken out of the envelope containing the money, in the presence of Secretary Hay, who retained the balance. No one but the dead Secretary knows exactly what the balance was expended for, though Mr. Michael's impression was that it related in some way to Chinese affairs.

Had no voucher been issued—and none was necessary—the matter would never have been so much as discussed. Nor would it have been subject to discussion if a clerk had not written in the words "for portrait of Judge Day, late Secretary of State," under the circumstances already fully detailed.

Now, surely, gentlemen of the House, no matter what their party affiliation may be, can not doubt that Senator ROOT was just as anxious to get at the bottom of this matter as anybody on this floor, and I think you will concede that he was fully as competent to ascertain the facts as any Member of this House. [Applause on the Republican side.] We believe that Secretary Root was just as able and just as anxious to get at the facts when he made the investigation in 1906, as is this committee. And we believe that Secretary Root's disposition of the matter, as already indicated in excerpts from his testimony, is much more reasonable than the strained attempt to make out a case against Mr. Michael, who is thousands of miles away and unable, adequately, to defend himself against the unjust attacks made on his character.

We do not believe it is the proper attitude to distort every bit of the testimony in such a way as to attempt to force the presumption of guilt, rather than to give it the reasonable and just interpretation that Secretary Root apparently gave it in his investigation.

As further showing the attitude of the subcommittee we call attention to the following (p. 77):

The CHAIRMAN. I wish you would go into some detail and tell how it happened that you discovered this voucher had been raised.

Nowhere is there anything to justify any suggestion of the voucher being "raised." (See also p. 155):

The CHAIRMAN. I attach no blame to you—no inference to you at all.

Secretary KNOX. I did not have the slightest idea that you did, because I had nothing to do with this thing and knew nothing about it except what the records disclose.

The CHAIRMAN. I am inclined to think that is true.

[Laughter on the Republican side.]

See page 197. The chairman asks: "Did you see any other papers 'fixed' up there when this investigation was going on in 1906?"

Now, I might go into the handwriting proposition and the attempt made to show that certain dates were so and so, but the result of the investigation was so disastrous along that line that the witness was stopped.

However, as showing the lengths to which the subcommittee went in its endeavor to cast reflection on the State Department, it is interesting to call attention also to the testimony of Mr. Henry W. Elliott, page 207 of the hearings.

Apparently, from the chairman's attitude (p. 161) Mr. Elliott was called for the purpose of showing that on the letter written by Mr. Rosenthal there was afterwards placed by some one else the words "Washington, 3/23/06." As showing his qualification as a handwriting expert, it is well to note that in his reply to the question of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], "What is your business?" Mr. Elliott replied, "Artist, naturalist, and real estate." Unfortunately, however, this "artist, naturalist, and real-estate man," did not give what was apparently desired, because after testifying that the same man wrote both the letter and the "Washington 3/23/06," but at different times, after giving this testimony, Mr. Elliott was excused.

Many other excerpts from the testimony could be given, showing partisan attitude of the subcommittee.

The severe strictures upon the conduct of present officials of the State Department are entirely unwarranted.

Though, as already stated, we were not invited to be present at the hearings, although we were not even notified of them, though ourselves members of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, still we have learned from the printed reports and otherwise that the present officials of the State Department gave much time to the hearings held before the subcommittee. Among others who showed this committee every courtesy in the way of giving information were: Assistant Secretary of State Wilson; Thomas C. Dawson, minister to Panama; W. J. Carr, Director of the Consular Service; former Secretary ROOT and the present Secretary, Mr. Knox; besides, of course, Mr. Morrison and other officials of the department.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be harsh upon my associates; but is it not strange, with a small committee of seven, when all these distinguished men were to appear, that we were not at least allowed to know about it before we read the sensational headlines in the papers?

In connection with furnishing secret papers to any committee that might ask for them it is interesting to note the language quoted from Democratic President Polk, page 97 of hearings, when in a message dated April 20, 1846, replying to a resolution requesting him to furnish similar records to the House of Representatives, he declined so to do. In the course of his message he said:

> It appears that within the period specified in the resolution of the House certificates were given by my immediate predecessor, upon which settlements have been made at the Treasury, amounting to $5,460. He has solemnly determined that the objects and items of these expenditures should not be made public, and has given his certificates to that effect, which are placed upon the records of the country. Under the direct authority of an existing law, he has exercised the power of placing these expenditures under the seal of confidence, and the whole matter was terminated before I came into office. An important question arises, whether a subsequent President, either voluntarily or at the request of one branch of Congress, can without a violation of the spirit of the law revise the acts of his predecessor and expose to public view that which he had determined should not be "made public." If not a matter of strict duty, it would certainly be a safe general rule that this should not be done. Indeed it may well happen, and probably would happen, that the President for the time being would not be in possession of the information upon which his predecessor acted, and could not, therefore, have the means of judging whether he had exercised his discretion wisely or not. The law requires no other voucher but the President's certificate, and there is nothing in its provisions which requires any "entries, receipts, letters, vouchers, memorandums, or other evidence of such payments" to be preserved in the Executive department. The President who makes the "certificate" may, if he chooses, keep all the information and evidence upon which he acts in his own possession. If, for the information of his successors, he shall leave the evidence on which he acts and the items of the expenditures which make up the sum for which he has given his "certificate" on the confidential files of one of the executive departments, they do not in any proper sense become thereby public records.

The majority report gives as reason for its attitude, to "restore confidence in those who handle the public funds and who represent us in important positions abroad."

Just how such a laudable purpose could be accomplished, even if necessary, by unjust attacks upon the State Department and its officials, as well as those who represent us abroad, I do not quite understand. Such an unjust course as advocated by this resolution would, we submit, absolutely destroy the confidence which the American people have.

The only reflection ever made upon John Hay, so far as I remember, is that contained in the report of this committee, and I believe I know that the whole country resents it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Why does not the committee state all, or at least some, of the splendid things that have been accomplished during the administration of Secretary Knox, instead of attempting to cast reflections?

We are proud of the record of Secretary Knox, who has been able to show a clean bill in his own administration, and, although unable to give unwritten history of transactions in previous administrations, he has been successful in showing any fair-minded person that the financial administrations of his predecessors have been upon a high ethical standard, although the tedious details of accounting and bookkeeping may have been in the past, under both Democratic and Republican administrations, in some respects unbusinesslike and out of date.

It has been pointed out that if Secretary Knox had thought the business organization of the State Department to be perfect he would not have made the complete reorganization of the department the very first act of his administration. Naturally in the process of reorganization, attention was first given to those units which affect the quality of the work of the department—that is, its efficiency in looking after the interests of the whole American people in the foreign relations of the United States. All the bureaus and divisions affecting real efficiency have been rearranged and reorganized along modern lines. Those bureaus not affecting efficiency were naturally the last to be taken up. It is known, however, that the methods of accounting and bookkeeping in the State Department have for some time been the subject for study. Their complete reform had been delayed by two considerations; first, the fact that certain reforms must depend upon legislation already requested of Congress to do away with obsolete requirements of "red tape," and, secondly, the President's commission on economy and efficiency, in cooperation with departmental committees, has been engaged for months in devising for all the departments uniform methods of accounting and bookkeeping, the purchase of supplies, and so forth, and it was necessary to await the perfection of the methods thus being worked out. These new methods have become effective July 1, 1911, I believe.

Secretary Knox has centralized the general financial direction and clearly allotted the expenditures in financial and diplomatic, consular, or departmental services, and also promulgated stringent regulations controlling absolutely the use of the appropriation for emergencies and limiting the practice of making secret expenditures from that fund to such only as the public interest absolutely requires not to be made public.

Regarding the criticism as to reporting the time of finding the papers, we call attention to the fact that the testimony of Secretary Knox on June 14 shows that he took pains to send word by Mr. Carr, of the department, to Mr. HAMLIN and to say that the Secretary would be prepared in a day or two to report the results of his investigation—results which had been foreshadowed in the testimony of former Secretary ROOT.

This courtesy was rewarded by the immediate service of subpœna upon the Secretary, instead of a request by telephone to attend a hearing and give the information.

Every phase has been handled as though the committee were dealing with criminals rather than with officials of a great department. The highest officials have been trusted to answer truthfully only under oath.

Every effort has been made to create the impression that there was something rotten in the State Department. The finding of the papers, though reported at the earliest possible time under all the circumstances, was made the basis of abuses and attacks, coupled with all sorts of suspicions, and conveying the impression that the committee had accomplished a wonderful Sherlock Holmes detective feat. Really, as a matter of fact, what was ascribed to the shrewdness of stern inquisitors was actually due to the fairness and frankness of the State Department in furnishing and laying before the committee all evidence obtainable.

As to finding the voucher, Mr. Michael surely can not be blamed in any wise in this connection, because he was thousands of miles away when it was found; and as to Morrison, if there was any guilt on his part that would impel him to conceal the voucher, he could have easily kept it from the committee, but he did not. He reported the finding, and the whole matter was given to the committee.

Had Morrison been desirous of bringing forward the voucher he would hardly have resorted to the clumsy device of throwing it on the floor for others to find. It would have been much simpler to have misplaced it in some file, and upon renewed search to have discovered it and explained its misplacement. It would have been equally easy for him to have destroyed it entirely. The very circumstances of its discovery and its prompt delivery by Morrison to his superiors in office shows his entire lack of duplicity hinted at in the majority report.

The voucher and its accompanying papers may have been held by somebody without authority, and such person might have taken this method of ridding himself of the papers.

It might be, too, that some one maliciously inclined and who wanted to injure and embarrass the present administration and the State Department deliberately dropped the papers, wrongfully held, in the office of the Bureau of Accounts.

Had the voucher never been found we would have heard a great deal about that. Now that it is found, capital has been attempted to be made out of this fact.

I am very glad it was found, because bearing, as it does, John Hay's signature, taken in connection with Michael's letter, it explains all, whatever the theory as to finding.

As to the matter of finding this voucher, concerning which there has been so much discussion in the public press, note further the following language on page 152, No. 6, of the hearings:

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any theory as to how that voucher got on that office floor five years after it was taken from the files?

Secretary KNOX. Yes. A man must have a theory about those things, whether it is a correct one or not. Of course, it is a matter I would not like to state, but I have a theory about it; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. But not sufficiently well founded that you would like to state it?

Secretary KNOX. I have no doubt that you have a theory about it, and I have no objection to stating what my theory is, but I do not state it as a fact; it is only a theory.

If the subcommittee were really anxious to get the exact facts, why was Secretary Knox not asked to state his theory?

This is one of the numerous instances where if we two members of the committee of seven could have been permitted to be present at the hearings we might have gotten some light that we desired. At any rate we would not purposely have left the matter in a haze for the evident object of casting suspicion.

Innocently or otherwise the idea became promulgated through the press that somebody was guilty, and there are men on that side with whom I have talked, who honestly thought there was something to it because they had heard only one side. In my very weak way, coming out of a sick bed, I have tried to give you something of the other side. I wish I had more time because the memory of John Hay and the reputation of Mr. Michael and Mr. Morrison are deserving of better defense than I can give; but I know that no man here, investigating this matter with the sole desire to arrive at the truth and laying aside partisan considerations, can come to any other conclusion than I did, namely, that there is absolutely nothing to these charges.

Here is a department that is handling millions upon millions of dollars, and men have been spending the time of Congress and public money to carry on the investigation of $1,600 in connection with a matter that required no further investigation and had been disposed of fully before by men better able than this committee to pass upon the facts.

What, then, can we say as to the conclusions of the majority report? We will consider them very briefly in their order.

First. There was no misappropriation.

Second and third. Conclusions 2 and 3 are absolutely inconsistent, as the one admits no voucher at all was necessary, and the other lays blame for not accounting for matters for which no voucher was needed.

Fourth. The fourth refers to the $1,600 as being in the possession of Morrison and Michael.

There is absolutely no evidence that either one of them had the $1,600 left after the $850 was paid for the Day portrait. The disposition of that $1,600 has been fully covered.

Fifth. As to the fifth conclusion of the committee, we may say that, of course, Secretary Hay did not take the $1,600 to his personal use. Nor did he have to account to anyone for the method in which it was used. The suggestion that Michael's letter reflects on Hay is too ludicrous to discuss. The only reflection on Hay that we ever heard of is that contained in the majority report, and we believe the country at large resents it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Sixth. There is absolutely no reason to believe that the $1,600 was misappropriated by Michael and Morrison, or either.

Seventh. Michael and Morrison would have been removed by Mr. ROOT or Mr. Knox had they been guilty of anything that justified any such course.

The last suggestion, as to the statute of limitations, and so forth, is entirely gratuitous and an evasion of the issue.

In conclusion, as further showing the attitude of the gentleman from Missouri, it is interesting to quote his language in the debate in the House on June 26, 1911, when the gentleman made the following statement:

I have gone into this matter far enough to know that the fund which is expressly appropriated for foreign intercourse and the promulgation of treaties with foreign nations has been shamefully abused—thousands and thousands of dollars of the people's money expended for which no accounting has been made to Congress, and none can be made under the law.

I defy the gentleman to show where this fund has been shamefully abused, as he glibly argues. Probably the generalization is based upon the same kind of information on which he asks that a faithful servant of the department, and who has been there ever since 1867—before many of us here in the House were born—that this faithful servant shall be discharged without any reason at all.

The gentleman from Missouri argues that for the entertainment of distinguished visitors the expense should be specifically appropriated by the House.

To this ludicrous suggestion the chairman of the Appropriations Committee made the following reply:

If Congress were to make specific appropriations in each instance when some representatives from other nations came here, and if Congress would determine to appropriate a certain sum for entertainment of a distinguished personage from one power, and some time afterwards a representative from another nation came and for any reason a different program were arranged and a different sum appropriated, it would result in an invidious comparison which would be more embarrassing than to permit some official, in his own discretion, to expend what would be a reasonable sum in each instance.

Under the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri, if followed, it would be necessary to call together the House every time any distinguished visitor might arrive and to figure out just how much we would expend on him. Did it happen to be a Persian, the expense would be a little different than for an Englishman; if from Morocco, a little different than for a representative from France, and so forth, for example.

Should we follow this idea, then when any gentleman representing a foreign nation would come, we would lay before him the exact bill of fare, showing the exact number and kind of sandwiches that had been allowed him and how much street car fare—just exactly in what limits he could move.

This would be a perfectly reasonable construction to place upon the unreasonable suggestion of the distinguished head of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department.

No; there is nothing to all this. There was no misappropriation. There was nothing wrong in the action of Morrison or Michael. The latter holds an important position thousands of miles away, and has been given no opportunity to appear in his own behalf. He would be discharged without reason and without trial if this committee's recommendation were to maintain.

Morrison is an old man. His service began before many of us here were born. Is that service to be rewarded with dismissal for no reason at all except to satisfy partisan prejudice and a desire to manufacture campaign thunder? The American people are fair; they expect this House to be fair.

For a period the public has heard only one side of this matter. We present the other. We fully realize that it is more popular to join in "muckraking" when the papers have, innocently or otherwise, given impressions that certain officials are guilty than it is to state the real facts. Still, it would be cowardly not to speak the truth and not to say what should be said, both in behalf of the men unjustly accused as well as in behalf of the integrity of the great Department of State, whose work under the administration of all parties has been of the highest order.

In closing it is worth noting, also, that even the highest officials of the United States have not been protected from innuendoes and attack, and suggestion of impeachment has even been made in the public press in the following language, copied from the Washington Herald of Thursday, June 29, 1911, closing paragraph of article on first page, first column:

According to the present plan, no resolution calling upon the President to comply with the recommendation of the committee will be introduced immediately. The report will be printed as a public document, and Chairman HAMLIN, it is understood, will ask that it lie on the table. If, however, after a reasonable time has elapsed President Taft fails to instruct Secretary Knox to dismiss Mr. Morrison and Col. Michael, a resolution intended to bring such action to pass will be introduced. In the event that the House passes this resolution and President Taft still refuses to comply with the request impeachment proceedings will be instituted at once.

The mere statement of the above shows the ludicrous lengths to which publicity in this matter has gone. Nothing has been spared to cast reflection all along the line.

So far as confidence in the State Department is concerned we are certain that the American public, as well as the world generally, has the greatest confidence in this department presided over to-day by one of the great men of the Nation, and numbering among its heads in the past, under the administration of all parties, men of the highest standing and integrity—men whose administration should not be attacked without the most thorough investigation on the part of those who make the attack.

Unwarranted criticism of our State Departmnet by a committee of either branch of the National Congress can not but injure the standing of the Nation in the eyes of the world, however unwarranted such criticism may be. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have half an hour more in which to conclude his remarks.

Mr. WEDEMEYER. I will conclude what I have to say in one minute.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I hope the gentleman will take half an hour. He is making a good speech.

The SPEAKER. The House passed an order of business. Of course the House can do anything it pleases by unanimous consent.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Michigan be extended half an hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to modify the order adopted this morning, so as to extend the general debate 30 minutes, and give that time to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HENRY of Texas, Mr. HEFLIN, and Mr. GARNER objected.

Mr. WEDEMEYER. I thank the gentlemen who objected, because I have nearly concluded what I have to say.

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. WEDEMEYER. At the close of the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] he made some uncomplimentary reference to the State Department in connection with myself, or to myself in connection with the State Department. I want to say again, because I want to be perfectly frank with the House, not having been given an opportunity to attend the investigations, and there being many things that I wanted to find out, I did go to the State Department. I did consult with the officials of that department. I got whatever suggestions I could. I got some suggestions from the minority leader [Mr. MANN]. Some of those suggestions from both sources were embodied in the views of the minority. If ever a man has worked hard and tried to prepare a thorough report on a matter, I have tried in this case, and I am sure my friend from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] will not make any suggestion to the contrary, because I do not think he harbors any ill feeling toward me, and I surely harbor none toward him; but I do want, in the moment I have remaining, to conclude by saying this:

Public confidence can hardly be strengthened by far-fetched attacks upon that great department of our Government—the one department that has especially to do with our relations with the world outside—and which, accordingly, last of all, should lightly be made the target for partisan attack.

I simply ask of you as American citizens and Representatives, laying aside partisan considerations and party advantage, to do justice to all whose names have been brought into this matter—to Secretary Hay, who is gone; to Morrison and Michael, who are still living. I ask you, without regard to partisan affiliations, to do by these men as you would wish to be done by under similar conditions. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

[H. Rept. 59, pt. 2, 62d Cong., 1st sess.]

PORTRAIT AND FRAME OF FORMER SECRETARY OF STATE WILLIAM R. DAY.

Mr. WEDEMEYER, from the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, submitted the following as the views of the minority, to accompany House resolution 103:

Although the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department consists of only seven Members, that committee, instead of carrying on the investigation of expenditures in the State Department by the full committee, as would be the proper course, has carried on the investigation referred to in the report of the committee presented to the House on July 5, 1911, through a small subcommittee. We can see no reason why the investigation should not have been carried on by the full committee and all members of the committee notified of the meetings. We think the action of the committee in appointing a small subcommittee instead of carrying on the investigation by the full committee of seven is subject to severe criticism. It is a practice which ought not to prevail. It is unjust to the members of the committee and to the department which is being investigated. If it had been intended to have a fair investigation the full committee should have been invited in.

The undersigned, members of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, were not on the subcommittee before which the hearings in the Day portrait matter were held. We were not notified of these hearings, and base our views upon the printed reports of the hearings, as well as some certain statements in the public press.

The Day portrait matter is not a new proposition, but is an old matter, which was fully investigated by Secretary ROOT several years ago. His investigation at that time satisfied him that there had been no misappropriation, and accordingly the matter was dropped until taken up again by the subcommittee.

In the report of the committee the following statement is made:

"It is the opinion of your committee that the practice of signing vouchers in blank is not only unbusinesslike and inexcusable, but amounts to a virtual invitation to wrongdoing, and such practice can not be too strongly condemned."

Certainly the State Department should not be condemned in this fashion for this practice. It is the prevailing practice under the Government, and the gentlemen who submitted the report, as well as all the other members of that committee and all the other Members of both the House and the Senate, invariably, and we believe without any exception, sign vouchers in blank, not only for their own salaries, but Members of the House also sign vouchers in blank for the amount allowed them for clerk hire in advance of the clerk performing the duty, and make a certificate to that effect.

If it is unbusinesslike for the State Department to have adopted this practice of the Government, it is much more unbusinesslike for the legislators who make the laws to adopt the practice themselves in their own actions as related to the Government.

Why should the members of the committee, who constantly sign vouchers often many months in advance, criticize the State Department for having permitted a voucher to be signed after the work had been performed?

The Members of the present House have each signed vouchers for clerk hire in advance running until December 1 next, and which vouchers so signed in advance state that the Member signing it has received the sum of $125 in full for amount due him as allowance for clerk hire necessarily employed by him in the discharge of his official and representative duties during the month of ———, which he certifies to be correct. These blank vouchers, though signed by the Members of the House some months ago, were signed in sufficient numbers to provide vouchers up to December 1 next, and the members of the committee which criticize the State Department for permitting a voucher to be signed in blank have themselves certified to be correct that they have necessarily employed a clerk months ahead of the time when such voucher is to be dated and used.

The following is the form of the voucher signed in advance by Members of the House:

No. ——

VOUCHER FOR CLERK HIRE FOR MEMBERS AND DELEGATES, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Received of South Trimble, Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, the sum of $125, in full for amount due me as allowance for clerk hire, necessarily employed by me in the discharge of my official and representative duties during the month of ———, 191—, which I certify to be correct.

(Signature) ——— ———

Member of the House of Representatives of the United States.

——District, State of ——

The criticism of the State Department by the majority of the committee in their report for permitting a voucher to be signed in blank would appear to be ludicrous in view of the action of the members of the committee in signing not only vouchers for clerk hire but certificates of correctness months in advance.

It is suggested in the majority report that every opportunity was given those interested to be heard. As a matter of fact, the man most vitally affected by the committee's report, Mr. Michael, was given no opportunity at all to be heard by the committee, but was condemned in the bitterest language and accused of dishonesty under the same facts on which Secretary ROOT dropped the investigation some years ago as not demanding his further attention. Surely the judgment of Secretary ROOT at the time when only two years had elapsed and the circumstances were fresh in the minds of the persons concerned, with a more intimate knowledge of the surrounding conditions than it is possible for the committee to have had, ought to be more convincing than that of the subcommittee, which made its investigations seven years after the transaction occurred.

In 1906 Michael stated to Secretary ROOT, according to the evidence, "the price of the portrait was taken out of the envelope containing the money in the presence of Secretary Hay, who retained the balance." Mr. Michael further stated that the money was obtained and brought to Secretary Hay by the latter's direction, and it seems to be an unquestioned fact that the voucher for the entire amount of $2,450 was approved by Secretary Hay with his own signature. There is no evidence in the published reports of the hearings in any way opposed to the statements of Mr. Michael. The majority of the committee, in reaching its conclusions, intentionally or unintentionally ignores the fact that the voucher bears Mr. Hay's written approval and the amount must be presumed to have been disbursed with his knowledge. It seems to be conclusively shown that at the time of approval the voucher contained no statement as to the precise purpose to which the $2,450 was to be applied, and it is not reasonable to suppose that Mr. Hay approved the voucher in that form without exact knowledge of the purpose of the expenditure.

Michael's statement in the previous investigation, according to the majority report, was that "he paid the money received from Morrison to Secretary of State Hay, and, while he did not know, he presumed that he used the difference in relation to the emergency or secret fund authorized by section 291 of the Revised Statutes for some item or items relating to foreign affairs." (See Michael's letter, pp. 159, 160; also Denby's letter, pp. 209–210 of the hearings.)

After a careful examination of the testimony, we see no reason for not accepting the full statement as a correct explanation of the whole affair. In other words, we agree with Secretary ROOT's disposition of it rather than with the far-fetched conclusion that Michael and Morrison made away with the money.

As to the fact that the voucher bore the words "For the portrait and frame of ex-Secretary Day" we call attention to the majority report itself, which recites from the testimony that when Morrison "delivered the sum of $2,450 to the said Michael he learned, either from Michael or some one in his office, that the money was to be paid for the portrait and frame of the portrait of ex-Secretary Day. At that time, according to the testimony of Morrison, there was nothing on the voucher to indicate the purpose for which this sum was to be utilized. After paying over this money to Michael and returning to his office, the said Morrison within 30 minutes caused a clerk in his office to write with pen and ink in parentheses on the voucher the following: 'For portrait and frame of ex-Secretary Day.' The said Morrison testified before your committee that he caused this memorandum on the voucher to be made for his own protection."

These facts are not at all inconsistent with the theory that the remaining $1,600 might not have been used, as Michael indicated, for secret emergency purposes by Secretary Hay. Mr. Morrison can not be supposed to have known the details of Secretary Hay's expenditure of the secret funds.

No voucher at all was needed if the Secretary of State wished to use the money for emergency purposes, and the amount of $2,450 could have been paid into Secretary Hay's hands without any voucher whatever.

There is no reason why we should go out of our way to ascribe dishonesty to an official in a far-away land, unable to protect himself, when that official's statement, made in a previous investigation, is perfectly reasonable and was so accepted by the State Department in that investigation.

Both Mr. Michael and Mr. Morrison are deserving of fair treatment at the hands of this committee. They should not be found guilty of dishonesty and recommended for dismissal unless there is real, tangible evidence against them, which is not the case here. Michael's letter and Morrison's testimony are straightforward and fair, while the attitude of the subcommittee is apparently bitter in the extreme.

The attack upon the State department officials is strictly unwarranted. Every courtesy was shown the committee by these officials, and though we were not invited to be present at the Day portrait hearings, we can realize from the printed accounts of them how much time was given to them by the highest officials of the department, even including the Secretary of State himself.

Now their courtesy is rewarded by an extremely unjust criticism, entirely unwarranted, as we believe, and calculated to injure us in the eyes of all the world.

The subcommitte knew from the documents and testimony before it, although it carefully omitted to say that the State Department has been completely reorganized during the past two years, that efforts have been made, with the aid of the President's Commission on Economy and Efficiency, to entirely modernize the accounting system of the department, and that legislation on that subject, recommended by the Secretary of State, is pending before Congress. Moreover, it is admitted by the majority report of the committee that it would have been proper for the Secretary of State to have paid out the entire amount of the fund without any vouchers whatever. It is submitted that the best evidence of the honesty and care with which the fund in question is administered is that the chief of the Bureau of Accounts, whom the committee would have dismissed in disgrace, has in every case vouchers approved by the Secretary of State for the moneys expended from that fund.

All too much sensational publicity has been given the unexplained details which have been magnified in the public press with no attempt to state both sides, but only an attempt to say something that would reflect upon the administration. The limit of this sort of publicity was reached when the following appeared in the Washington Herald, June 29, 1911, first column, first page:

"According to the present plan no resolution calling upon the President to comply with the recommendation of the committee will be introduced immediately. The report will be printed as a public document and Chairman HAMLIN, it is understood, will ask that it lie on the table. If, however, after a reasonable time has elapsed, President Taft fails to instruct Secretary Knox to dismiss Mr. Morrison and Col. Michael, a resolution intended to bring such action to pass will be introduced. In the event that the House passes this resolution and that President Taft still refuses to comply with the request, impeachment proceedings will be instituted at once."

As indicated at the beginning, none of the hearings on the Day portrait matter were conducted before the whole committee, though there were only seven members in all. We did not even know, and had no way of learning, when the hearings, or most of them, were to be held. Accordingly, in attempting to prepare our views we find ourselves in the position of an attorney who is asked to prepare for the appellate court a case that he was not permitted to try in the lower court. We have had to take the record as we have found it, without any opportunity on our part to ask questions, which might have completely cleared up any situations at all in doubt. Still, though denied that opportunity, we think the record clearly forbids any such report as has been presented. It could not be more unfair, and we are surprised that the stigma of thievery would be placed upon men, one of whom, an American citizen like ourselves, is holding a position far away, and is being condemned without reason and without hearing on the very evidence which Secretary Root considered as satisfactorily explaining the whole matter in the investigation of some years ago.

Following this general statement of our position, even at the risk of some repetition, we have undertaken to recite with more particularity the full facts in the case. We specially call attention by italics to important matters ignored by the majority report, since that report reveals the suppression or omission of much that is absolutely necessary to a full and fair understanding of the whole matter.

The evidence shows that ex-Secretary, now Associate Justice, Day was requested by Secretary Hay to have a portrait painted for the State Department collection of ex-Secretaries of State, and to have it made by an artist of Mr. Day's own selection; that in the autumn of 1903 Mr. Day engaged Albert Rosenthal to paint the portrait, the price agreed upon for portrait and frame being $850; that Mr. Rosenthal completed the portrait, selected a frame at the V. G. Fischer Art Co., to cost $60, and both portrait and frame were accepted by the State Department in the early part of 1904; that in receiving payment for the portrait the said Rosenthal dealt exclusively with W. H. Michael, then chief clerk of the State Department; that the said Rosenthal signed a blank voucher, which he delivered to the said Michael, either personally or through the mail, his recollection being that it was signed in Philadelphia and sent to the said Michael by mail; that on January 18, 1904, or later, his recollection not being clear on this point, the said Rosenthal signed a receipt for $790 for a portrait of Judge Day, adding in his own handwriting "this does not include the frame, for which Mr. Fischer received directly from the department $60;" that subsequently, on March 22, 1904, the said Rosenthal deposited the said Michael's individual check for $790, the sum due the said Rosenthal, the check having presumably been received by him about the date upon which it was deposited; and that in June, 1904, the V. G. Fischer Art Co. deposited a check from the said Michael or the Department of State for $60, presumably received about that time, in payment for the frame.

The evidence further shows that about two years after the transaction above detailed, to wit, in 1906, the said Rosenthal interviewed the State Department relative to the painting of a portrait of Secretary Hay and was informed that his price was too high. In substantiation of the statement Charles Denby, then chief clerk of the department, showed the said Rosenthal the voucher signed about two years previously in blank, the said voucher appearing solely to be for a portrait of ex-Secretary Day, in which the sum paid was stated to be $2,450. This appears to be the first information the said Rosenthal had that the voucher represented an excess of $1,600 over the price actually paid for the portrait and frame.

The evidence further shows that at the time the above voucher was signed and the money paid for the portrait, one Thomas Morrison was the disbursing clerk of the State Department, and has remained in such position since and up to the present time. Morrison is bonded in the sum of $50,000.

The evidence further shows that the said Morrison, as such disbursing clerk, on the verbal request only of the said Michael, as chief clerk, drew a check on the Treasury Department for the sum of $2,450, which was cashed in the usual manner through one of the messengers of the disbursing bureau on the 16th day of January, 1904, and the money deposited in the safe in the office of Morrison as such disbursing clerk, where it remained until the 18th day of January, 1904, when the said Morrison delivered in person to the said Michael the sum of $2,450, taking no personal receipt, but relying alone on the said voucher signed by Rosenthal and approved by Secretary Hay.

The evidence further shows that although this sum of $2,450 was paid over to Michael by Morrison in January, 1904, Rosenthal was not actually paid by Michael until March, 1904, and the Fischer Art Co. in June, 1904, so far as may be presumed from the fact that they deposited the checks in those months, though the dates of said checks are not in evidence.

The said Morrison testified that when he delivered the sum of $2,450 to the said Michael, he learned, either from Michael or some one in his office, that the money was to be paid for a portrait of ex-Secretary Day. At the time, according to the testimony of Morrison, there was nothing on the voucher to indicate the purpose for which this sum was to be utilized, although the voucher in that form bore the approval of Secretary Hay. After paying over this money to Michael and returning to his office, the said Morrison, within 30 minutes, caused a clerk in his office to write with pen and ink in parenthesis on the voucher the following: "For portrait of Judge Day, late Secretary of State." This language is the exact language appearing on the voucher, though in the majority report, as well as in our own views, other words expressing the same idea, but not identical, are used.

It also appears from the evidence that in 1906, when the matter of the above voucher was investigated by the State Department, at the time presided over by ex-Secretary (now Senator) ROOT, Michael was called upon by Mr. Root for information respecting the voucher for $2,450, and in the language of the report submitted by the majority of the committee—

"reported that he paid the money received from Morrison to Secretary of State Hay, and while he did not know, he presumed that he used the difference in relation to the emergency or secret fund authorized by section 291 of the Revised Statutes for some item or items relating to foreign affairs. At the time that Michael made this report Secretary Hay was dead."

The majority report, however, fails to give Mr. Michael's statement correctly. It is as follows:

"I was directed by Secretary Hay to write to Judge Day and ascertain whether the portrait was entirely satisfactory to him and the price agreed upon. In reply to my letter, Judge Day said the portrait was satisfactory to him, and stated the price to be paid. This letter I handed to Secretary Hay. He took a memorandum out of his portfolio and, after looking at it, directed me to make out a voucher for a certain amount—I do not now recall the amount—to pay for the portrait, and to hand him the balance, which he desired to apply on other emergency accounts. He did not say what the accounts were, and the only impression I got was that they related in some way to Mr. Rockhill, in connection with Chinese affairs.

"The amount of the voucher—whatever it was—was delivered to me by some one from the Bureau of Accounts, according to my recollection. The price of the portrait was taken out of the envelope containing the money in the presence of Secretary Hay, who retained the balance."

The evidence further shows that when the committee started the investigation of the transaction a request was made for the voucher relating to the payment, and that it was reported as not being in the files; that Secretary Knox ordered a thorough search to be made for the papers and received a report that they could not be found; that while the committee's investigation was pending the voucher and other papers were found on the floor of the said Morrison's office, within 5 or 6 feet of Morrison's desk, by one of the messengers in that bureau; that about a week later the Secretary of State took the pains to send Mr. Carr to notify the chairman of the committee that he had found the voucher, had practically completed his investigations, and would lay the results before the committee in a day or two. Notwithstanding this offer, the Secretary was subpœnaed to produce the papers to the committee the following day, which was done.

The majority report then proceeds to criticize the course of the officials of the State Department in "trying to conceal, and, in fact, concealing, from the committee for about 10 days the fact that the long-lost and much-sought-for voucher had been found," and in doing so the report suppresses and makes no allusion to the fact known to the committee—that the President had directed the Secretary of State to investigate the matter and to submit the result of the investigation to him, when he (the President) would determine whether the result should be communicated to the committee. (See the President's letter of June 2, 1911; p. 98 of the hearings.) The officers of the State Department were therefore merely carrying out the instructions of the President, and are to be commended rather than criticized for their course in the matter.

Coming now to the conclusions of the majority report, the minority disagree with these conclusions and hold:

(1) That section 291 of the Revised Statutes is at most an authorization, not even a direction, to the President, as to the manner of accounting for moneys expended for intercourse or treaty with foreign nations which it is not advisable, in his opinion, to make public. That section creates no fund out of which a payment can be made. The appropriation for "Emergencies in the Diplomatic and Consular Service, and to extend the commercial and other interests of the United States," from which the payment for the portrait appears to have been made, is by law to be expended pursuant to section 291, which vests in the President the discretion as to making the expenditures from that appropriation public. In so far as concerns the practice of purchasing portraits of ex-Secretaries of State from that fund, it is submitted that the existence of the practice since 1890 of various Secretaries of State, under both political parties, constitutes a strong presumption in favor of its legality and propriety.

(2) The minority agree that no voucher is required by law when either the President, or the Secretary of State acting under the President, desires to use a sum of money for the purpose of intercourse or treaty with foreign nations, and deems it advisable that the expenditure should not be disclosed to the public, but the minority highly commend the practice of the Department of State in keeping on file vouchers for such payments as businesslike and calculated to insure the proper expenditure of the Government money.

(3) The minority regard the conclusion that $1,600 of the $2,450 included in the Rosenthal voucher has been misappropriated as unsound and unsupported by any evidence whatever. To reach such a conclusion it is necessary to disregard the statement of Mr. Michael, the fact that the voucher bears the approval of Secretary Hay, the statement of Mr. Morrison that the words "for portrait of Judge Day, late Secretary of State," were based upon information given him by some one in Mr. Michael's office after the approval of the voucher by Secretary Hay and the payment of the money to Mr. Michael, and to assume that Secretary Hay carelessly approved the payment of money from an appropriation for which he and the President alone were responsible, and without undertaking to learn the purpose to which the money was to be applied, which assumption we believe to be entirely unwarranted and contrary to reason. To agree with the conclusions of the committee it would also be necessary to disregard the investigation made in 1906, which satisfied Secretary Root that the money was not misappropriated, an investigation made within two years after the transaction occurred, when the facts were undoubtedly fresher in the minds of those concerned and conditions generally more favorable for ascertaining the truth than at the present time, more than seven years after the transaction occurred. We think it an outrage that an investigating committee, without a scintilla of evidence which would stand in any court in this country, should publicly condemn and demand the dismissal of two officials holding responsible positions, one of whom is a bonded officer, against whose bond suit might be brought if the committee had evidence upon which to maintain such a suit.

The report of the majority of the committee is a weak, partisan effort to make scandal. It is an attempt to besmirch the memory of one of our greatest Secretaries of State, the late John Hay, whose shining character and unfailing fairness are in marked contrast with the report of the committee, but whose probity stands too high to be reached by partisan prejudice.

The effort to condemn Michael without a chance to be heard is itself a scandal. It reaches the lowest depths of unfairness. It shows a biased mind which is not seeking justice. It is assassination of character from behind.

Nor is there a particle of evidence of wrongdoing on the part of Morrison.

In fact, we consider the report of the majority a greater reflection upon the fairness and intellectual integrity of those who made it than it is upon the honesty of those whom it condemns.

We take it that the majority report is only an evidence of a partisan intention to accuse officials under Republican administration of dishonest conduct, regardless of facts and evidence. The intention is to make mud and throw it, hoping that some will stick. We protest against the methods of carrying on the investigation and pronounce the report as subversive of common fairness and the ordinary rights of persons accused of crime.

JOHN Q. TILSON.
WM. W. WEDEMEYER.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I invite the attention of the House to an appeal from the Legislature and the commissioner of agriculture, State of Georgia, accompanied by a resolution adopted by the Georgia Legislature. They present a question of great importance to the cotton farmers, and I invite my colleagues here to give them the consideration which the importance of the subject deserves. I understand the author of both the appeal and the resolution is the Hon. Thomas H. Kimbrough, one of the best men in the world, a representative from Harris County, Ga., in the Georgia Legislature. He is himself an enterprising and successful farmer. He not only understands the cotton situation but has been a leader in the reform which has characterized Georgia in the way of diversified crops, which to a large extent has relieved her farmers from the former State of absolute dependence upon the cotton crop. In addition to his farming operations, he has always run an up-to-date gin, and has been entirely familiar with the subject of cotton in all its phases. His views are worthy of attention:

AN APPEAL TO THE PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS.

To the President and Congress of the United States:

The inclosed resolution of the General Assembly of Georgia presents to you a question of much importance, and under instructions therein contained we desire to stress a few salient points:

First. The conditions existing at the time of the adoption of the present tare of 6 per cent on cotton bales compared to the prevalent conditions of the present. (See preamble to resolution.)

Second. When cotton was very cheap and bagging and ties very expensive, the demand was made upon the producer to use sufficient bagging to fully protect his cotton, thereby saving a heavy loss and insure its arrival at destination in good shape. The producer complied with the demand notwithstanding the heavy expense.

Third. Since conditions have been reversed, and though this tare is universally estimated at 6 per cent, or 30 pounds per bale, and cotton is quoted to the markets of the world with this estimate in mind, yet shippers and agents have assumed the authority to dock every bale of cotton $1 if fully covered and protected, and to enable them to carry out their plans have secured a new construction of that clause of the "Marine laws of the United States" relating to the covering and protection of cotton for shipment.

Fourth. We recognize the fact that legislation in our State can not change the policy of any other country, yet we insist that no policy of importance affecting the rights of different individuals, vocations, or countries should be adopted except through mutual consent of those interested.

Fifth. Recognizing the right of petition and believing that State Departments should use their influence to correct such existing evils of importance as may be beyond the reach of State legislation, we most respectfully ask that our legations and consuls be instructed to use every means in their power to satisfactorily adjust this matter and correct this wrong, first, by demanding that if the present tare is just there shall be no discrimination against any bale of cotton when only the required amount of covering is used to fully protect it. We believe that cotton should be wholly covered, yet, if those interested in its purchase think it necessary, we insist that a new and uniform tare be adopted not to exceed 3½ per cent to 4 per cent.

Sixth. We insist that this injustice and wrong is an unbearable hardship, in that it appropriates the property of the cotton producer to the use of those not entitled to it, and that it is a robbery of those bona fide citizens who by hard labor and constant toil are annually creating the large balance of trade in our favor and contributing largely to the wealth of the United States. They have a right to ask justice and are entitled to as much consideration as are the citizens of any section.

Our only recourse is to secure the cordial cooperation and assistance of the National Government, and most respectfully beg a prompt consideration.

ISAAC A. BUSH,
Chairman Senate Committee on Agriculture.
M. L. JOHNSON,
Chairman House Committee on General Agriculture.
T. G. HUDSON,
Commissioner of Agriculture.

House resolution 23.

Introduced by Messrs. Kimbrough, of Harris, and Johnson, of Bartow, and adopted by the general assembly at the session of 1911:

Whereas "tare" in commerce is the weight of the cask, box, bag, canvas, or bands containing and keeping in good condition articles of merchandise, and is deducted from the gross weight and recognized as legal and binding on the trade;

Whereas the uniform "tare" of 6 per cent on cotton baled for the market was adopted by foreign exchanges when the average weight of the American cotton bale was 425 pounds and when the bagging and cordage weighed about 27 pounds, and from that time to the present has been deducted from the price of our cotton by both American and European manufacturers;

Whereas since the adoption of this "tare" the American cotton bale has increased in weight to an average of 506 pounds, the weight of bagging and bands have been decreased fully 25 per cent, yet the shippers and manufacturers of cotton have in recent years assumed the authority to dock every bale of our cotton that is contained and protected by a covering and bands if these should exceed 4 per cent, thereby robbing the cotton producers of Georgia of 20,000,000 pounds of the fleecy staple, and other sections in proportion: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (senate concurring), That this is a gross injustice to those citizens of our country who are annually creating the large balance of trade in favor of the United States, and it is a wrong that can not be maintained upon any fair business principle or legal right.

Be it resolved, That the agricultural committees of the house and senate be, and are hereby, instructed to make an earnest appeal to the Congress of the United States, the President, the Department of Commerce, and the Secretary of Agriculture to give to this subject that prompt consideration which its importance demands, and put forth such efforts as may be necessary to bring about this important reform in our cotton trade; be it further

Resolved, That the commissioner of agriculture of Georgia be requested to cooperate with said agricultural committee, and that an effort be made to secure the cooperation of the Association of American Cotton Manufacturers and domestic exchanges, to the end that this matter be satisfactorily and promptly adjusted, and trust that the effort will not be made the coming season to rob the cotton producers of America of $15,000,000 out of the growing crop of 1911, and that in future the farmers of Georgia and the South will be able to secure justice on this question.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the House should adjourn at this time, could we proceed to-morrow under the rule as we are proceeding to-day?

The SPEAKER. If the House adjourns until to-morrow, after the House is called to order and the Journal is read and an opportunity had to correct it, the House can proceed with this bill, barring conference reports.

Mr. MANN. There are no conference reports that could be acted upon under the rule.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. RICHARDSON, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, leaving copies, the papers in the case of Mrs. Edith A. McCarteney, Sixty-first Congress.

PORTRAIT OF FORMER SECRETARY OF STATE WILLIAM R. DAY.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some difference of opinion as to the effect of this rule. I ask unanimous consent that we proceed to-morrow, immediately after the reading of the Journal and the approval of it, to the further consideration of this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that after the reading of the Journal to-morrow the House shall proceed with the consideration of this resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask whether under the rule the House would not be required to proceed to-morrow for the further consideration of this resolution?

The SPEAKER. That is the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. MANN. And in that opinion I fully agree. I shall not object to the request of the gentleman from Missouri, although if I did not fully agree in the opinion of the Chair, that the matter would be in order anyhow, I should object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, August 5, 1911, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

By Mr. KAHN: Resolutions of Alameda County, Call., Pharmaceutical Society, against House bill 8887; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SHARP: Resolutions adopted by Bellevue Chamber of Commerce, of Bellevue, Ohio, favoring a 1-cent postage rate on ordinary letters; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, August 5, 1911.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings when, on request of Mr. CULLOM and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 15 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 130) making appropriations for certain expenses of the House of Representatives incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2983) for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Thirteenth Census.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 130) making appropriations for certain expenses of the House of Representatives incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a petition of the Licensed Tugmen's Protective Association, praying that the hours of labor for dredge operators engaged on Government work be limited to eight hours a day, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. ROOT presented petitions of the Chamber of Commerce of Syracuse; of the Business Men's Association of Auburn; of the West Side Business Men and Taxpayers' Association, of Buffalo; of the Employers' Association of Buffalo; of the Chamber of Commerce of Binghamton; of the Chamber of Commerce of Kingston; of the Business Men's Club of Middletown; of the Chamber of Commerce of Olean; of the Board of Trade of North Tonawanda; of the Board of Trade of Niagara Falls; of the National Association of Manufacturers; of the Manufacturers' Association of New York City; of the Fulton Market Fishmongers' Association; of the Fruit and Produce Trade Association, of New York; of the Chamber of Commerce of Newburgh; and of the Chamber of Commerce of Rochester, all in the State of New York, praying for the ratification of treaties of arbitration between the United States, Great Britain, and France, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of Roosevelt Camp, No. 9, United Spanish War Veterans, Department of California, of Los Angeles, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation granting pensions to widows and minor children of soldiers and sailors who served in the War with Spain and the Philippine insurrection, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented memorials of the Citrus Protective League, of Los Angeles; of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco; of the Chamber of Commerce of San Diego; and of the Chamber of Commerce of Fresno, all in the State of California, remonstrating against lemons being placed on the free list, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of California, remonstrating against the adoption of the so-called La Follette amendment to the wool schedule, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CRANE (for Mr. LODGE) presented petitions of the Chamber of Commerce of Washington, D. C.; the Merchants' Association of Worcester, the New England Hardware Dealers' Association, the Board of Trade of Holyoke, the Board of Trade of Lowell, the Board of Trade of Pittsfield, the Board of Trade of Northampton, and the Board of Trade of Somerville, all in the State of Massachusetts; the Merchants' Association of Honolulu, Hawaii; the Board of Trade of Hilo, Hawaii; and the Business Men's League of Greenville, Miss., praying for the ratification of an unlimited treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JONES presented memorials of James A. Sexton Post, No. 103; Stevens Post; Sexton Post, No. 133, of Seattle; McDowell Post, No. 22, of Pomeroy; Stevens Post, No. 1; Colonel Hiram Burnam Post, No. 76; and W. B. Hazen Post, No. 46, of Ritzville, all in the State of Washington, remonstrating against the appropriation of $100,000 being made for the erection of a monument at Vicksburg in honor of Confederate soldiers, which were ordered to lie on the table.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. BURNHAM introduced a bill (S. 3174) granting an increase of pension to William H. Marshall, which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

Mr. OWEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 14) approving the constitutions formed by the constitutional conventions of the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

SENATE ELEVATOR CONDUCTORS.

Mr. NELSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 128), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate $150 each to the following named elevator conductors, for extra services rendered during the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, said compensation being for Sunday, holiday, and night work: Parker Williams, S. A. Maryman, J. R. Williams, H. S. Van Vorhis, A. B. Crossley, W. B. Ellis, F. L. Thompson, E. E. Young, N. T. Morgan, and C. A. Geisel.

CHEROKEE ALLOTMENT ROLLS.

Mr. OWEN. I offer a resolution asking for certain information from the Department of the Interior, which I ask may be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 129), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior, if not incompatible with public interests, be requested to furnish the Senate with the following information:

1. How many acres of land did the Cherokees own subject to allotment under the Cherokee agreement of 1902? Equivalent to how many complete allotments according to the appraisement by the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes?
2. As the records have been corrected to date, how many persons entitled to allotments have their names on the Cherokee rolls as of September 1, 1902?
3. What is the amount of money belonging to the Cherokees at this date subject to supply deficiencies in land allotted to the Cherokees, including all amounts which have heretofore already been paid for that purpose?
4. How many persons on the 1902 roll have been allotted any land whatever in the Cherokee Nation?
5. How many have received half allotments or less?
6. How many minors born since September 1, 1902, have been enrolled by the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes?
7. How many minors living March 4, 1906, qualified for allotment under the Cherokee agreement, i. e., living also September 1, 1902, have been enrolled?
8. How many persons born since September 1, 1902, having one white parent have been enrolled?
9. Estimate how many freedmen, including minors, will be added to the Cherokee allotment rolls if the decree of the Court of Claims in the Moses Whitmire case, dated February 20, 1911, is carried out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I should like to have the resolution agreed to. It merely calls for information from the Interior Department.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GAMBLE. I suggest to the Senator that there will be a meeting of the Committee on Indian Affairs on Monday, and prompt action will be taken.

Mr. OWEN. Very well; that will be satisfactory.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

LAST WILL OF GEORGE WASHINGTON, ETC.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have a copy of the last will and testament of George Washington, embracing a schedule of his real estate and explanatory notes thereto, to which are added important historical notes, biographical sketches, and anecdotes. I move that the paper be printed as a public document. (S. Doc. No. 86.)

The motion was agreed to.

CONSIDERATION OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of Senate resolution 109 regarding the legislative program.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate resolution 109. Is there objection?

Mr. HEYBURN. Let it be read for information.

Mr. NELSON. Let the resolution be reported.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

HOUR OF MEETING ON MONDAY.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, in view of the unanimous-consent agreement and the fact that several Senators have given notice of their intention to speak on Monday on the statehood joint resolution, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. on Monday next.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I move as an amendment that the hour of meeting on Monday be 10 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York moves as an amendment that the hour of convening on Monday be 10 o'clock a. m. rather than 11 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I readily concur in that suggestion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan accepts the suggestion and modifies his motion accordingly. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan as modified.

The motion as modified was agreed to.

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 14) to admit the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona as States into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent to have read the amendment proposed to be offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the amendment which the Senator from Minnesota intends to offer.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of the joint resolution after the word "That," in the first line, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

The constitution formed by the constitutional convention of the Territory of New Mexico, elected in accordance with the terms of the act of Congress entitled "An act to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, etc.," approved June 20, A. D. 1910, which said constitutional convention met at Santa Fe, N. Mex., on the 3d day of October, A. D. 1910, and adjourned November 21, A. D. 1910, and which constitution was subsequently ratified and adopted by the duly qualified electors of the Territory of New Mexico, at an election held according to law on the 21st day of January, A. D. 1911, being republican in form and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence, and complying with the terms of said enabling act, be, and the same is hereby, approved, subject to the terms and conditions of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution reaffirming the boundary line between Texas and the Territory of New Mexico," approved on the 16th day of February, A. D. 1911.

SEC. 2. That the Territory of Arizona be admitted into this Union as a State with the constitution which was formed by the constitutional convention of the Territory of Arizona, elected in accordance with the terms of the enabling act approved June 20, A. D. 1910, which constitution was subsequently ratified and adopted by the duly qualified voters of the Territory of Arizona at an election held according to law on the 9th day of February, A. D. 1911, upon the fundamental condition, however, that article 8 of the said constitution of Arizona, in so far as it relates to the "recall of public officers," shall be held and construed not to apply to judicial officers, and that the people of Arizona shall give their assent to such construction of article 8 of the said constitution.

That within 30 days after the passage of this resolution and its approval by the President the President shall certify the fact to the governor of Arizona, who shall, within 30 days after the receipt of such certificate from the President, issue his proclamation for an election by the qualified voters of Arizona, to be held not earlier than 60 nor later than 90 days thereafter, at which election the qualified voters of Arizona shall vote upon the proposition that "article 8 of the constitution, in so far as it relates to 'recall of public officers,' shall be held and construed not to apply to judicial officers," and shall also vote for State and county officers, members of the State legislature, and Representatives in Congress, and all other officers provided for in said constitution of Arizona; said election to be held and the returns thereof made, canvassed, and certified as provided in section 23 of the enabling act approved June 20, 1910.

If a majority of the qualified voters of Arizona voting at such election ratify and adopt the herein proposed construction of article 8 of the constitution, the same shall be and become a part of the said constitution, and said article 8 of said constitution, in so far as it relates to the "recall of public officers," shall have like effect as if judicial officers were expressly excepted therefrom.

If the proposed construction of said article 8 of the constitution is duly ratified and adopted by the qualified voters of Arizona, the election of officers at the same election shall be and become valid and effective.

When said election as to the proposed construction of the said constitution and of State and county officers, members of the legislature, and Representatives in Congress, and other officers provided for in said constitution has been held, the result thereof shall at once be certified by the governor of the Territory of Arizona to the President of the United States, and if the proposed construction of article 8 of the said constitution of Arizona has been ratified and adopted by a majority of the qualified voters of Arizona voting at such election, the President of the United States shall immediately make proclamation thereof and of the result of the election of officers; and upon the issuance of said proclamation by the President of the United States, Arizona shall, without other proceeding, be deemed admitted by Congress into the Union by virtue of this joint resolution, upon the terms and conditions of the said enabling act approved June 20, 1910, except as modified herein, and on an equal footing with the other States.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, a few days ago, while the Senate had under consideration the joint resolution for the admission of the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] addressed the Senate, opposing the initiative, referendum, and recall provisions of the Arizona constitution. I shall make an analysis of the address and a presentation of the fallacies of his opposition to the fundamental principles of popular government.

In addresses before the Senate on May 5, 1910, and February 27, 1911, I discussed at length the initiative, referendum, and recall and other laws, which have become known as the Oregon system. Since those addresses are in the RECORD and available for any who wish the information they contain, I shall not burden the Senate by covering the same ground again.

At the risk of the charge of egotism, but for the purpose of demonstrating that the popular-government doctrines are receiving widespread attention throughout the country, I will state that I have received requests for over 4,000,000 copies of the popular-government speech of May 5, 1910, and over a million copies of the Federal-patronage speech of February 27, 1911—I do not mean individual requests, but that the number of speeches asked for aggregate these figures.

Every person who heard or who has since read the address of the Senator from Utah must have observed that he endeavored to ridicule the popular-government movement and its advocates. To those whose sense of humor is peculiarly developed, I have no doubt there was both amusement and entertainment in his reference to the "insurgent soothsayers," "irresponsible balloonatics," "political quacks," "political zealots," "self-constituted reformers," "false pilots," arrant knaves," "visionaries," "dreamers," and "demagogues."

I repeat these words because it is common knowledge that calling names is the resort of men who lack better argument, or, I might say, judgment.

Quite likely the Senator will say that if the coat does not fit me I should not put it on, and I reply that if the names were not intended particularly for me, they certainly were directed at the entire class of advocates of popular government; and, deeming myself as uncompromising an advocate of popular government as anyone, I must assume my share of the evidently intended humiliation incident to the shower of epithets. I do not concede, however, that it is within the power of the Senator from Utah to injure any man or class of men by calling names. Sneers are not argument; ridicule is not logic.

To that portion of the Senator's address devoted to ridicule I shall attempt no reply. Ridicule is a weapon in controversial warfare in the use of which I have no skill, for I have always refused to support any cause that could not be sustained by appeal to reason alone. To the extent that levity may be considered a material factor in determining the merits of the initiative and referendum and recall, I leave the field entirely to others, for resort to ridicule is as far from my abilities as it is from my inclinations, as foreign to my talents, as it is obnoxious to my taste.

It remains for the Senate and the country to say how much weight ridicule shall have when thrown into the balance against the practical demonstrations that have been conducted in Oregon, the results of which are a matter of record, open to the scrutiny and criticism of all who care to read and consider.

GOV. WOODROW WILSON'S PROGRESSIVENESS.

Before proceeding to a consideration of the serious features of the Senator's address I wish to speak a word in behalf of a man who can not be here to speak for himself. The Senator undertook to strengthen his opposition to the initiative and referendum by quoting views held by Hon. Woodrow Wilson when he was a college president and contrasting them with views now held by that gentleman when he is a governor and probable candidate for the Presidency. The Senator "prefers the calm, reflective judgment of the college president to the fevered hallucinations of the hopeful presidential candidate." He believes that those who indorse Wilson's later utterances are appealing from "Philip sober to Philip drunk."

We all know that when Woodrow Wilson held his former views he was without practical experience in politics. He was a mere theorist. He knew little or nothing of the devious ways by which the political boss manipulates conventions and controls legislatures. But having learned practical politics by practical experience he changed his opinions. We are appealing from Wilson ignorant of politics to Wilson wise. In both instances we have the views of Wilson honest and certainly, in the later instance, Wilson courageous, for it takes true courage for a man to acknowledge the errors he made perpetual by placing them on the pages of history.

Though I can not always agree with Gov. Wilson, I respect his ability, commend his frankness, and admire his courage. His successful efforts for the regeneration of his State make him safe from the criticisms of those of us who have less of achievement to our credit. May success attend all his and every other person's efforts for better government.

DIFFERENT VIEWS ON FUNDAMENTALS.

Mr. President, the Senator from Utah and I differ widely on the fundamental principles which underlie the American Government. I believe in the absolute sovereignty of the people. But the people cease to be sovereign whenever, by physical force or political machination, their will is suppressed or thwarted or ignored. I believe in truly representative government, not a pure democracy; but under the political system which has been built up government is not truly representative.

I am concerned with the fact of representative government and not merely with the name. No government is truly representative unless the people have power to make it so. The initiative and referendum supersede no State legislature; they merely provide the people a means of securing laws which legislatures refuse to enact and of defeating undesired laws which legislatures do enact. The recall gives the people power to expel from office a public servant who has demonstrated that he does not truly represent them. The initiative and referendum and recall vitalize rather than destroy truly representative government.

That is my view. Now consider the view of the Senator from Utah. He says:

Our present form of representative government—

Note, Mr. President, he insists upon the "present form," while I insist upon the present form modified by adoption of the initiative and referendum and recall by the several States. He says:

Our present form of representative government, under which laws are made by specially chosen legislators, construed by specially chosen and trained judges, and enforced by specially chosen executive officers, I am firmly convinced is the only practicable form of government for a country of immense area and great population, such as ours. Whenever it proves ineffective or works badly the fault is not with the machinery, but with those who are operating it. The remedy is not for the people enmasse to attempt to manipulate the complicated and delicately adjusted mechanism, which must inevitably lead to confusion and disaster, but to exercise more care in the selection of their specially chosen operating agents.

The language of the Senator is more appropriate than I imagine he intended. He very truly says that legislators, judges, and executives are "specially chosen." Herein lies the evil. Special interests, backing the political bosses, who understand the delicate mechanism of which the Senator so fondly spoke, have too much power in "specially" choosing the officers of government under present methods. The people demand that public servants be generally, and not "specially," chosen. They ask a voice in the choosing. They demand the adoption of the initiative, under which they can force the enactment of efficient primary laws, thus overthrowing the power of political bosses to select candidates under the convention system. The people demand more than the privilege of choosing between two candidates each of whom was nominated by political bosses.

FAULT WITH THE MACHINE, NOT THE PEOPLE.

The Senator says that whenever our present form of representative government proves ineffective or works badly, the fault is not with the machine, but with those who are operating it. The remedy is for the people to exercise more care in the selection of their operating agents.

With this I can not agree. As long ago as the oldest Senator can remember we were told that poor public service was our own fault in not choosing better officers. The people have tried this remedy as often as can be expected of a patient body of citizens. They have silently and submissively listened to the oft-repeated assertion that if they do not get good service it is their own fault—that the machine is perfect. Now they seek another remedy, and have decided to try changing the machinery—not by demolishing it, but by providing a few new levers and drivewheels and brakes, so they can make the machine go to suit themselves. Too long they let it run to suit "special choosers."

When he asserts that the fault lies with the people if they have bad government, the Senator may find many approving hearers among professional politicians, but few throughout the country. Many a time the people have voted for a new deal and secured not a new deal but a new dealer, who shuffled the same old pack of marked cards and walked away with the cash. If the Senator will travel over this country telling the people that it is their own fault if they have bad government and that there is nothing wrong with the machinery, he will return to Washington with new impressions of the intelligence and also the candor of American citizens. No doubt he will conclude that the country is full of "insurgent soothsayers," "quacks," "political zealots," "balloonatics," "self-constituted reformers," "visionaries," and "demagogues."

I think, Mr. President, I have made clear the most important difference between the views of our governmental system entertained by the Senator from Utah and those held by myself. He believes the machine is all right, but the fault lies with the people. I believe the people are all right, but the fault lies with the machine.

The people will reform the machine if given a chance. In Arizona 76 per cent of the people voted to reform the machine by adopting the initiative and referendum and recall, and eventually they will do it in every other State. The difficulty is that legislatures can not be induced to submit to the people constitutional amendments providing these new levers, drive wheels, and brakes in the governmental machine.

NEW MEXICO CONSTITUTION OPPRESSIVE.

Another wide difference between the views of the Senator from Utah and my own is shown by his assertion that the New Mexico constitution is not open to the criticism that amendments thereto are too difficult to obtain. The provisions of the New Mexico constitution on this subject have been clearly stated and explained in the report of the House Committee on Territories, and I therefore read that portion of this report:

Article XIX as adopted requires that amendments may be proposed by two-thirds of all the members elected to each house of the legislature, except that at the first regular session held after the expiration of two years, and every eight years thereafter, a majority can propose amendments; but in either case only three amendments can be submitted at one election, and this must be a general election, and all amendments must be ratified by a majority of the electors voting thereon, and this majority must equal 40 per cent of all the votes cast for any purpose and 40 per cent of the vote cast in at least one-half of the counties of the State. The question of calling a constitutional convention can not be submitted to a vote of the people until the expiration of 25 years, except by a three-fourths vote of all the members elected to each house of the legislature, and to call a convention during that period there must not only be a majority of all the electors voting at the election, but there must also be a majority of all the electors voting in one-half of the counties.

From a consideration of these provisions it will be seen that it will be extremely difficult for the people of New Mexico to secure the holding of a constitutional convention during the first 25 years, and when these provisions are considered in connection with the apportionment for members of the legislature provided by the constitution, the extreme difficulty of amending the constitution in any way will be manifest. By reference to the apportionment, it will be found that the four counties of Colfax, San Miguel, Bernalillo, and Socorro, with an aggregate population of 77,000, and which, on the basis adopted by the constitutional convention for representatives in the senate, would entitle this population to between 5 and 6 senators, are so apportioned that they constitute parts of 10 senatorial districts and can control the election of 10 of the 24 senators, and thus prevent the securing of two-thirds of the senators necessary to submit to the people an amendment to the constitution.

Then it will be further seen that if under such conditions an amendment is submitted to the people the constitution makes it extremely difficult to secure the necessary vote for its adoption. To adopt such an amendment a majority of the electors voting on the amendment must, of course, vote for it, and in addition this majority must consist of 40 per cent of the vote cast on all questions and 40 per cent of the vote cast in one-half of the counties. Thus it will be seen that if an amendment is submitted at a general election at which 25,000 votes are cast, but only 10,000 votes cast upon the amendment, 9,000 of which are in favor of it and 1,000 against it, the amendment would be lost, because 40 per cent of all the votes cast at the election were not cast for the amendment. Or, again, if the amendment was popular in 12 of the 26 counties and unpopular in the other 14, 15,000 votes might be cast for it and none against it in the 12 counties and 3,500 votes for it in the other 14 counties and 6,500 against it, and yet an amendment upon which there might have been 18,000 votes cast for and 6,500 votes against would be lost. It is only necessary to call attention to such provisions to secure their condemnation.

It is moreover found that the population of the counties lying along the eastern border of New Mexico have increased very rapidly in population in the past decade and will probably increase more rapidly in the future. The apportionment provided in the constitution suggests the denial of adequate representation to the rapidly increasing population of that section for a long time, unless the constitution is made more easy of amendment.

Certain other provisions of the constitution as framed and adopted are very objectionable, and will in their operation be very oppressive to the people of the new State, and it is claimed that they were brought about at the instigation and in the interest of certain large corporations and special interests whom it is claimed exerted large influence in the framing of the proposed constitution.

The oppressive provisions of the New Mexico constitution thus exposed and condemned by the House committee meet the approval of the Senator from Utah. I am willing to let this subject rest with the mere statement of what the New Mexico constitution provides, feeling satisfied that no reader of its provisions will question the charge that the limitation upon amendment was framed by representatives of special interests rather than by representatives of the people.

CAUSE FOR DISSATISFACTION.

Mr. President, the Senator from Utah said that—

> There is a good deal of political and social unrest not only among our own people but throughout the world. That there is justification for much of the dissatisfaction which exists can probably not be truthfully denied. The conditions, however, which have given rise to this feeling call for sane, wise, level-headed counsel and consideration.

Observe, however, that after acknowledging that there is cause for dissatisfaction and that the conditions call for wise counsel, he suggested no new plans for improvement. His argument was objection, his effort obstruction. While offering no remedial plan of his own, he criticizes and condemns the constructive plans formulated by others. When he announced several days in advance that he would on a given date deliver an address upon this subject, I anticipated that in lieu of plans formulated by others he would offer some remedy of his own superior in merit and promising quicker and more lasting reforms. In reading his address from beginning to end I was utterly disappointed in this respect.

This age is not one of destructive or obstructive, but rather one of constructive, tendencies. The American people are not satisfied merely to be told that evils exist. They desire a practical remedy. Even if the initiative, referendum, and recall were still in their experimental stages, the people would prefer to experiment with these new methods in government rather than to continue under methods demonstrated unsatisfactory in the past. Fortunately, however, the initiative and referendum at least have passed the experimental stage in Oregon.

PEOPLE DESIRE IMPROVEMENT.

After having admitted justification for much of the dissatisfaction which exists, the distinguished Senator says that "changes in governmental forms are advocated apparently for the mere sake of change." With this view of the spirit which actuates the American people I can not agree. In my opinion, changes are advocated for the sake of improvement. I assert this not only as to the advocacy of changes which I believe to be desirable, but am willing to concede the same high motive to advocates of changes which I do not support. There are, for instance, people in these United States who advocate governmental principles which constitute what is known as socialism. I am not a Socialist, though I believe in some ideas advocated by that political party. Some of the teachings of socialism I believe to be unwise. Nevertheless, I freely admit that I may be wrong and they may be right. Many of us are believers in political principles or methods which 20 years ago seemed impracticable or even foolish. But whether I agree with the Socialists or not, and whether time shall disclose that they are in error or that I am, I shall not charge them with advocating changes in governmental form for the mere sake of change. I know of no class of people who are more zealously devoted to principles in which they believe or who are apparently actuated by a more unselfish desire to promote the general welfare than are the Socialists, and while I may not agree with all their views, I do not question the purity of their motives or the sincerity of their efforts to secure what they believe to be a change for the better. With the few rare exceptions of men who are criminal by nature and professional politicians and lobbyists, I believe that all men are anxious for the enactment of laws and establishment of customs which they believe will improve conditions for themselves and their fellow men.

THIS GOVERNMENT BEST, THOUGH IMPERFECT.

Understand, I do not contend that our system of government is wholly bad. On the contrary, I assert that with all its faults it is far better than any other system of government existing in the world to-day. I am not one of those, however, who wave the starry flag with patriotic ardor and rest satisfied in the belief that this Government is the best the world has ever known. Governments, like all other human institutions, are imperfect, and however high my regard may be for the framers of our Constitution, it is no lack of respect for them or regard for their high ability to say that they were unable either to frame a perfect constitution for the social and economic conditions of their day or to frame a perfect constitution for the conditions existing a century and a quarter later. The doctrine that the king can do no wrong was abandoned on American soil before the bells pealed forth the glad tidings of liberty on that memorable day, July 4, 1776. Based upon the same reasoning by which the people arrived at the conclusion that the king could do wrong, it follows beyond controversy that the individuals who met in Federal Constitutional Convention were also subject to the limitations of human frailty and might err in judgment, however lofty their ideals and pure their motives. The wise and patriotic citizens who prescribed a form of government adopted by the American people in 1789 were no more competent to prescribe limitations upon activities of government in 1911 than were the doctors or lawyers or other learned men of that day competent to prescribe in their particular lines of study the remedies and procedures which serve the needs of the sick in body or troubled in business in this day and generation.

I would not have the hardihood to call myself a progressive if I sent telegrams almost instantaneously from the Atlantic to the Pacific, read in to-day's papers the happenings of yesterday in South Africa, witnessed men flying in circles around the Dome of the Capitol, observed the working of a machine which made visible a bullet embedded in the body of a human being, watched the complex organization of a Government of 90,000,000 people, reflected with pleasure upon the state of religious toleration as compared with the incidents of religious persecution in the early days of Massachusetts—I say, Mr. President, if I observed all these marvelous evidences of advancement in human knowledge and power and then undertook to assert that wisdom died with the founders of our Government, that an attempt to amend the Constitution they framed is sacrilege, and that an effort to improve State constitutions is folly, I would not have the hardihood to call myself a progressive.

PROGRESS HAS BEEN CAREFUL.

The Senator says "that it is high time for a reaction to the ancient but discredited common sense which thinks before it acts instead of repenting afterwards." I am not sure to what period in American history the Senator's reactionary movement would carry him in order to find a time when there was more careful thinking before action than there is to-day.

Surely the American people have thought long enough on the subject of popular election of Senators. Discussion of the initiative and referendum has been going on for more than a quarter of a century. The first initiative and referendum amendment was adopted in South Dakota in 1898, which was 13 years ago, and the Oregon amendment was adopted in 1902, which was 9 years ago.

There has been no thoughtless and hasty action upon this subject, and yet there has been real and substantial progress in the movement for the adoption of popular government. The initiative and referendum have been adopted in Oregon, Oklahoma, Nevada, Missouri, Montana, South Dakota, Colorado, Arkansas, and Maine. The State of Utah has adopted an amendment which, however, I understand is inoperative because of lack of legislation.

Initiative and referendum amendments have been indorsed by legislatures for submission to the people in the States of California, Washington, Wyoming, North Dakota, Nebraska, Florida, Idaho, and Wisconsin.

The Oregon plan of popular election of Senators has been adopted in Oregon, Nebraska, Nevada, Minnesota, New Jersey, Ohio, Wisconsin, Kansas, and California.

The States that have adopted the Oregon plan of popular vote for candidates for nomination for President and Vice President are Oregon, Nebraska, New Jersey, North Dakota, and Wisconsin.

NO REACTION DESIRED.

It is worth while to note that although this great progress has been made, there is in no State a demand on the part of the people for a repeal of any of these laws. If the laws were injurious in their effect, there would undoubtedly be an overwhelming demand for their elimination from constitutions and statutes.

But since the Senator proposes a reaction to some ancient plan of procedure, I wonder if he remembers that on January 20, 1911, he read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD part of a report filed by Mr. LAWRENCE in the House of Representatives, discussing governmental evils that existed in the State of New York. Because the evils then depicted still obtain to a greater or lesser degree in these days, I feel it my duty to read again into the RECORD the following two paragraphs, which the Senator from Utah submitted for the consideration of the Senate last January:

> But appalling and startling as these have been in our past history they are all surpassed in some respects by those perpetrated in the general election in the State, and especially in the city of New York, on the 3d of November, 1868. These frauds were the result of a systematic plan of gigantic proportion, stealthily arranged and boldly executed, not merely by bands of degraded desperadoes, but with the direct sanction, approval, or aid of many prominent officials or citizens of New York, with the shrewdly concealed connivance of others, and almost without an effort to discourage or prevent them by any of those in whose interests and political associations they were successfully executed, who could not fail to have cognizance of them and whose duty it was to expose, defeat, and punish them.

These frauds were so varied in character that they comprehended every known crime against the elective franchise. They corrupted the administration of justice, degraded the judiciary, defeated the execution of the laws, subverted for the time being in New York State the essential principles of popular government; robbed the people of that great State of their rightful choice of electors of President and Vice President, of a governor and other officers; disgraced the most prosperous city in the Union; encouraged the enemies of republican government here and elsewhere to deride our institutions as a failure; and endangered the peace of the Republic by an attempt to defeat the will of the people in the choice of their rulers.

Commenting upon conditions described in that report, the Senator from Utah said:

And it is to such halcyon conditions as these that the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Georgia desire to return.

In view of the fact that Oregon has enacted under the initiative a corrupt-practices act which absolutely eradicated evil methods like those described in the report from which this quotation is taken, I feel that I am justified in applying to himself the criticism voiced by the Senator from Utah against the Senators from Maryland and Georgia. It is to such halcyon conditions as these that the Senator from Utah desires to return.

THE COMPOSITE CITIZEN UNSELFISH.

Mr. President, the Senator from Utah has seen fit to ridicule that portion of my address of February 27, 1911, in which I expressed my conviction that the action of the composite citizen always tends to promote the general welfare. He quoted the following portion of my address:

The people can be trusted. The composite citizen knows more and acts from higher motives than any single individual, however great, experienced, or well developed. While selfishness is usually dominant in the individual, it is minimized in the composite citizen. The composite citizen is made up of millions of individuals, each dominated in most cases by selfish interest. But because of the difference in the personal equations of the individual units making up the composite citizen, there is a corresponding difference in the interests dominating said units; and while composite action is taking place friction is developed, attrition results, selfishness is worn away, and general welfare is substituted before action is accomplished.

In further elucidation of the composite citizen, or aggregate of individual citizens, I assert that self-interest is the force controlling every action of the individual—not necessarily always selfish interest, for sometimes the individual is satisfied with his participation in the improved general welfare incident to the action. Generally, however, the individual action when unrestrained is governed by his own selfish and personal interest.

No two people in the world are exactly alike; consequently each individual has a different viewpoint or idea as to what constitutes his own particular personal or selfish interest. Where individuals act collectively or as a community, as they must under the initiative, referendum, and recall, an immense number of different forces are set in motion, most of them selfish, each struggling for supremacy but each different because of the difference in the personal equation of the different individuals constituting the community. Because of their difference, friction is created—each different selfish interest attacks the other because of its difference. No one selfish interest is powerful enough to overcome the others; they must wear each other away, and general welfare, according to the views of the majority acting, is substituted for the individual selfish interest. If all the individual units of society were alike, then selfishness would not only dominate the individual but the community action as well. But as long as no two people are alike just so long will selfishness dominate the individual, if permitted to act independently, while general welfare must control all community action, for if the individual can not secure the gratification of his own selfish desire then he must rest satisfied with the improved general welfare in which he as one of the units of the community is a proportional participant.

This logic applies to a community or a class. Under the initiative, referendum, and recall there can be no class or community action against the general welfare of the majority of the citizens constituting the zone of the action. The individual, through realization of the impossibility of securing special legislation for himself and against the general welfare of the community, of which he is only an individual unit, soon ceases his efforts for special privilege and contents himself with efforts for improved general welfare; thus the individual, class, and community develop along the lines of general welfare rather than the lines of selfish interest.

In further refutation of the unwarranted fear of hasty or unwise community action, I assert that no individual will ever vote for or assent to a change unless satisfied that that change will directly benefit him individually or that the action will bring improved general welfare to the community, in which event he is satisfied with proportional participation incident to that improvement.

In other words, community action determines the average of individual interests and secures the greatest good for the greatest number, which is the desideratum of organized society.

Hence I again assert that the people can not under the initiative enact legislation against general welfare or in favor of any selfish interest, nor will they select any public servant whom they believe will be dominated by any selfish interest. Though I grant they may make a mistake in selecting public servants, I assert that they will not make the same mistake twice in the same individual. That is, under an efficient direct primary law the people will not twice nominate an individual who has failed to serve faithfully the community he represents.

I have demonstrated that under the initiative and referendum the people can not legislate against the general welfare, and by the same logic I assert that under the recall the people will never recall a public servant, judicial or otherwise, who serves the general welfare.

JUDGMENT OF MANY BETTER THAN JUDGMENT OF FEW.

Criticizing my theory that all the people acting jointly are more unselfish than individuals acting separately, he says, "There are some people who seem to imagine that there is some mysterious virtue in numbers; that 10 men are necessarily more moral and more honest than 1 man." He might well have added, more intelligent. Our jury system is based upon the belief that the judgment and honor of 12 men are more to be relied upon than the judgment and honor of 1 man, and inasmuch as the Senator has admiration bordering upon adoration for that which has come down to us through the centuries, I am surprised that he questions the theory that 10 men acting together will reach a more honest conclusion than 1 man acting alone.

We have adopted the principle in this country that all the people are more competent to choose a President and a Vice President than are the members of the electoral college, notwithstanding the Constitution of the United States, as it was originally framed, contemplated that the members of the electoral college should exercise their own judgment in electing a President and Vice President. The Senator will hardly undertake to contend that we have erred in abandoning the old theory and adopting a new system which makes the members of the electoral college mere messengers conveying the wishes of the people of their States to the National Capital. In my opinion popular election of Presidents is no more an improvement on the original plan of representative election than the popular nomination of candidates for President and Vice President will be when that system has been adopted in all the States, as it has been already adopted in five of them.

In this respect I doubt not the Senator from Utah and myself radically differ upon what I believe to be a fundamental of popular government. He prefers the old convention system; I prefer a direct primary, believing that if the people are competent to choose between candidates at the general election they are also competent to choose between candidates for the nomination. For instance, any man who was competent to choose between Mr. Taft and Mr. Bryan in the last general election is competent to choose between Mr. Taft and Mr. La Follette at the coming primaries, and, in my opinion, it is far better to trust the selection to all the members of a party than it is to vest this power in any limited number of delegates, either self-chosen or chosen by the manipulators of a political machine.

THE PRESIDENTIAL PRIMARY LAW.

The facility with which the Senator from Utah conjures up possible evils arising from the extension of popular government is illustrated by his remarks regarding my presidential preference bill, adopted by the people of Oregon at the last election. He refers to this measure as—the law providing for the election of delegates of the several political parties to their respective national conventions, every delegate so elected being entitled to receive from the State treasury the amount of his traveling expenses necessarily spent in attending the convention, not to exceed $200. Hereafter when a group of enterprising gentlemen may desire a pleasure trip at the public expense all they will need to do will be to organize a party, call a national convention, and select themselves delegates.

When the presidential preference bill was before the people of Oregon the politicians and other enemies of popular government resorted to this same expedient of telling only half the truth, thus hoping to defeat this bill, but failed in their efforts. The Senator ignores the main feature of the law which gives the people an opportunity in party primaries to express their choice for President and Vice President, thus instructing the delegates whom they shall support for party candidates in the national conventions. He magnifies that provision which authorizes the payment of actual traveling expenses of delegates not exceeding in amount $200 for each.

The Senator, in my opinion, misjudges the intelligence of the people who may read his address. He does not realize that every man who reads his criticism of this public expenditure of not to exceed $200 for each delegate will know that heretofore delegates had either paid their own expenses or have had them paid by individuals who had a special interest in securing the attendance of the delegates. In either event, under the old convention system the expenses of some of the delegates were a part of the expense of maintaining the political machine, and sooner or later, by direction or indirection, the expenses were repaid by the people either through the distribution of patronage or other recognition of the political obligation.

The bill which I proposed, and which the people of Oregon adopted, makes the delegate the representative of the people, and by providing for the payment of his expenses makes it possible for the man of moderate means, as well as the man of wealth, to be a delegate to a national convention, and it relieves him from all obligation to any person or individual. The people by their direct vote for candidates for President and Vice President will instruct the delegates as to whom they shall support, and the wishes of the operators of "steam rollers" will be of no avail.

By the adoption of this system political bosses, backed by campaign contributors, will be deprived of the power to select candidates, and thus Presidents will be relieved of that embarrassing obligation that the nominee must feel toward those who have placed him in office.

CONVENTION SYSTEM MISREPRESENTATIVE.

The convention system is the greatest evil of representative government. The nominee of a convention knows to whom he owes his selection, and with that knowledge goes a natural desire to repay the favor. Practical politics has established the custom of discharging political obligations by the distribution of Federal appointments, with only a secondary consideration for qualifications and efficiency. Under a direct-primary system the candidate does not know to what individuals he owes his nomination, and therefore his only obligation is that of rendering the best possible service to all the people, making appointments with that sole end in view.

The new Oregon law is merely an extension of the direct primary and can be readily adopted in every State having the direct-primary system.

I have long believed that satisfactory government can not be attained without destroying the obligation that must exist between public officials and the individuals securing their nomination. Therefore I issued an address to the people of Oregon in 1909 urging the importance of the extension of our direct-primary law in this respect, asserting that other States would follow Oregon's example, thus giving the people of the United States the same power in the selection of candidates for President and Vice President that the people of Oregon now have in the selection of candidates for governor and United States Senator.

Immediately thereafter I caused a bill to be prepared and submitted to the people of Oregon, under the initiative, proposing an amendment to the direct-primary law, providing that in each year of presidential election the primaries shall be held in April and that opportunity shall be given the voters to express their preference for party candidates for President and Vice President, and to elect delegates to the national conventions and nominate their party candidates for presidential electors. As required by our initiative and referendum amendment, the petition proposing the bill was signed by 8 per cent of the voters of the State and was filed in the office of the secretary of state more than four months prior to the general election. It was presented under the management of the People's Power League, composed of a number of the most progressive citizens of the State.

A full copy of this bill, as of all other initiative and referendum measures, was published in the publicity pamphlet, together with arguments for and against. A copy of this pamphlet was mailed by the secretary of state to every registered voter after registration. By means of this pamphlet and of circular letters the voters were informed as to the nature of this and other measures.

OPPOSED BY MACHINE POLITICIANS.

The presidential preference bill was very generally opposed by machine politicians, who oppose any extension of popular sovereignty, preferring the system of delegated power under which they have been enabled to commercialize politics and the legislative and administrative branches of city, county, and State governments.

On the 8th of last November the people of Oregon enacted this law. Since then Nebraska, North Dakota, Wisconsin, and New Jersey have adopted virtually the same law. It is, of course, the desire of each political party to nominate the strongest candidate, but there is usually great difficulty in deciding upon the individual. In view of these States enacting presidential-preference laws, aspirants for presidential nomination and all their friends will watch with anxious interest the popular vote in these States, for it must be acknowledged that their votes will indicate the trend of opinion throughout the United States.

The Republican and Democrat, respectively, who has the popular indorsement of his party in these States will have a great advantage in the national convention, for no party can safely ignore public opinion carefully expressed. My own judgment is that if the vote in these States shows a decisive preference for any aspirant, that aspirant will be nominated by the convention, notwithstanding the tremendous power of the Federal machine and the 338 southern and Territorial Republican delegates ordinarily controlled by it. No convention will, however, nominate a candidate if its delegates feel sure he will be defeated.

INSTRUCTION NOT IRONCLAD.

The popular vote in party primaries in these States will be in the nature of an instruction to their delegations in the national conventions, but the delegates will not be bound to vote for the choice of their State if they find that by so doing votes would be thrown away. There is a moral obligation upon them to support the choice of the members of their respective parties so long as the aspirants indorsed have a chance of winning the nomination. Though there will be no legal obligation, it is safe to say that no delegate will lightly ignore the popular expression.

In my opinion, the Oregon idea of direct selection of party candidates for President and Vice President will be adopted in a majority of the States within the next decade. General adoption of this system will relegate the "steam roller" to the political scrap heap and its operators to the shadow of things forgotten. Southern Republican delegations will no longer be the vest-pocket trading material of Republican bosses, nor will Democratic delegations from solid Republican States in the North be subject to the will of Democratic bosses. The voice of the people will be heard in the selection of candidates, and delegates will be made, as they should be, mere messengers conveying the expressed wish of the people whom they profess to represent.

PRESIDENTIAL PRIMARY MEANS ECONOMIC SAVING.

Popular selection of candidates for President and Vice President would mean a saving of hundreds of millions of dollars now wasted through industrial inactivity due to the unsettling of conditions incident to a change of administration. Under the convention system candidates are not always chosen for their fitness to render good service to the country. Selections of candidates are too often influenced by promises of patronage, power of the administration over delegations controlled by Federal officeholders, or by campaign contributors. Very frequently a fight over the governorship will give one faction or the other control of a State delegation and thus determine its attitude toward the presidential nomination when the Presidency was not considered the paramount issue by the members of the party in selecting delegates to the State conventions.

As a result of this system, men may be nominated for President who were not even under discussion when the delegates were chosen. Consequently the people of the country know little of the man and must await his demonstration of ability and the disclosure of his policies. To a large extent they withhold confidence until they have reason to believe he will "make good." For a considerable period before and after every presidential election industrial activity lessens and there is enormous economic waste through the idleness of men, machinery, and capital.

Practically all this waste would be saved under a system of popular selection, for it would be known in advance that the people of the country would select the man in whom they had most confidence; and, assured of this confidence, industrial enterprise would proceed with little, if any, interruption.

In my opinion, under a system of popular selection, candidates would be chosen generally from among governors of States who had rendered distinguished service. There would be no possibility of the nomination of "dark-horse" candidates.

No man would secure indorsement of the people unless he had either demonstrated his qualifications by service rendered or won their confidence by presentation of sound principles offering concrete solutions of pending governmental problems.

THE PEOPLE ARE CONSERVATIVE.

Enemies of popular government have offered the objection that under a system of direct selection of candidates the people would choose a man extremely radical and dangerous to wise government.

There is not a page in American history justifying such an estimate of the American people. Conservatism is one of their characteristics. In the language of the framers of our Declaration of Independence, they are "more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed."

Hence the people have long deferred the task of overthrowing the convention system, with selfishness the destroying force, and substituting popular government, with general welfare the vitalizing force. They have been willing to endure the wrongs imposed by their supposed representatives who owed their first allegiance to political bosses and campaign contributors, rather than assert their right to control their Government and make their public servants accountable to them alone. Experience shows that the people will not vote for a change unless convinced it will be a change for the better.

Aware of this spirit of conservatism and having the utmost confidence in the intelligence, honesty, and independence of the people, I had no hesitancy in proposing a bill giving the people power by direct vote to choose party candidates for President and Vice President, and I urge the adoption of that plan in every State.

"MULTIPLICATION TABLE" TEST.

In another of his numerous displays of contempt for popular government, the Senator says that—

> Some people seem to imagine that by adding together a thousand individuals, none of whom have ever gone beyond the multiplication table, some strange and weird transmutation results by which the combined mass is enabled to work out the most difficult problem in Euclid with the utmost accuracy.

I would much prefer that the Senator had made his application of this remark definite and direct. However, since he was discussing the competency of the people of the country to vote upon problems of government rather than problems in Euclid, he evidently means to convey the opinion that people whose education was limited to the elementary studies are not qualified, acting in the composite, to consider and decide upon measures prepared and submitted to them under the initiative. I have not contended that problems of government should be solved by men of elementary education alone. The popular-government idea contemplates that all people—the highly educated as well as those of only common-school education—shall participate in this important duty.

I grant that the technical work of drafting a measure in order to make its language clear and precise should be performed by men of skill in that particular, but the people as a whole are the best judges of the principles involved and can be trusted to pass upon the merits. When it comes to a matter of judgment, the destinies and welfare of States are safe from injury at the hands of men who have never gone beyond the multiplication table.

The Senator should remember that the chief attention of Congress in recent years has been devoted to the effort to curb the rapacity of large business interests, to regulate trusts, to control railroad rates, to prevent manufacture and sale of injurious food products, prohibit corrupt use of money in elections, and to simplify court procedure so that the result of litigation shall not depend upon which litigant has the greatest power of financial endurance. Evidently the situation is such that the Government has more trouble with men who have gone beyond the problems of Euclid than it has with men who stopped with the multiplication table. The Senator and his dying cause are welcome to all the consolation they can get out of meditation upon the force of his illustration, employed, I hope, in an hour of levity, and not the product of serious thought.

TENDENCY OF LAWYERS IS REACTIONARY.

But, Mr. President, we are dealing with conditions, not with theories, and hence I feel it not inappropriate to recall the Senator from his flight of fancy and remind him of the fact that although the matter of judicial procedure is almost entirely within the control of lawyers, most of whom have gone far beyond the multiplication table, our system of jurisprudence is the object of severe criticism by men in every walk of life.

I believe the Senator to be as honest in his opposition to State-wide initiative, referendum, and recall constitutional amendments and statutes as I am in my advocacy of same.

I think the Senator's prejudice against these fundamentals of popular government is due to his profession. The Congressional Directory states that "he was admitted to the bar in 1883, and has followed the practice of the law continually since that date."

As a class, lawyers are probably the best intellectually equipped men in society, yet, by reason of their training, in most cases the orbit of their thought reaches only to bounds already fixed by precedent. This is especially true of the great corporation lawyers, whose salaries have been commensurate with their ability to stretch the national, state, and community laws to their utmost elasticity, even to the breaking point, if by so doing they could increase the profits of their clients and at the same time keep them out of the penitentiary.

That class of attorneys who are open to engagement on either side of almost any case have no fixed opinions until after receipt of retainers, hence their inclination to question the motives of other men who have definite ideas. They go to the textbook and precedents for their ideas, and the older the book the more reverence it receives. Thus many lawyers become human conduits for dead men's ideas.

On the other hand, the business man, the economic student, members of other professions than the law, and even the humble toilers who have not gone beyond the multiplication table, deal little with the past, but chiefly with the present and future. These men study present conditions and by original investigation and exercise of imagination and initiative strive to devise new remedies for old evils.

The whole trend of the lawyer's development has therefore been along destructive and avoidance rather than constructive lines, hence the tendency to become reactionaries, and the more profound the lawyer the greater the tendency. Certainly nothing is to be hoped for in the way of progressive legislation while erstwhile corporation lawyers exercise the functions of the lawmaker. Any departure from established forms of government or law is looked upon with grave apprehension by many of the great lawyers of the country and their echoes. By echoes I mean the heads of many of the great corporations of the country, who, in the past, have depended entirely on their corporation counsel not only for construction, but ofttimes for attempted destruction of laws.

The presidents and managers of corporations have devoted their time solely to the questions of increased earnings for the time being. Daily value of securities, rather than stable values and general prosperity, has been the limit of their horizon. The general public as well as competitors, and in some instances the small stockholders, have been considered their prey; special privileges, rather than justice and protection of all liberty and property rights, their goal. They deemed government a menace to their interests, and whenever it could not be utilized for their own special purposes they have tried to weaken, attacking it rather than strengthening it and cooperating with it. They have failed to realize that retribution as well as compensation is a law effect and that the domination of the commercial forces over the police force of society must result eventually in anarchy and the elimination by violent methods of themselves and their illegal accumulations, rather than the enjoyment of legitimate increment under just laws, giving equal protection to the personal liberty and property rights of all.

Quite likely the Senator from Utah will say: "Well, suppose all this to be true. What is your remedy? Would you bar the lawyer from being a legislator?" No; but I would advise the electorate to select and elect a majority of any legislative or administrative branch of their Government from wide-awake business men and from students of political and social conditions whose training has been along progressive lines, whose initiative and imagination have had full scope, and whose judgment and wisdom have been demonstrated by success in legitimate fields.

As a rule the student and business man will originate the ideas, lead the progressive movements; the lawyer will provide the legal verbiage and the corporation lawyer try to beat its enactment, or, if unsuccessful, will then endeavor to prove it unconstitutional if it in any degree minimizes special privilege.

EFFECTIVENESS OF INITIATIVE HAS BEEN DEMONSTRATED.

Mr. President, although declaring his unqualified opposition to the initiative, the Senator from Utah has unwittingly paid a high compliment to the practical effectiveness of that amendment. He says he favors the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people, and so far as I can observe by his address, this is the only feature of popular Government that he does favor.

The initiative was adopted in Oregon in 1902, and at the very first election thereafter the people of Oregon adopted, under the initiative, a direct-primary law which provides not only for the nomination of candidates for Senator by direct vote in the primary, but also for a popular vote upon candidates in the general election and for an optional pledge by candidates for the legislature to support the people's choice for United States Senator. That law, enacted by the people under the initiative, has proven an effective means of establishing popular election of Senators in that State. Since the adoption of that law three men have been elected to the United States Senate from Oregon, and all were chosen by the people, the legislature merely ratifying the popular choice and doing so without a moment's delay and without any of the bartering of offices or trading in legislation which theretofore prevailed in Oregon and which, I believe, now exist in practically every State in which legislative election of Senators still obtains.

The Senator professes to believe the initiative is not an effective means of legislation. Yet he says that any system should be judged by its fruits, with which I agree. Since the Oregon initiative has proved effective in securing the reforms most desired by the people of Oregon and desired by the people of every other State in the Union, I assert that it has demonstrated its worth. If the Senator really desires to secure popular election of Senators in his own State, he should first secure the practical operation of the initiative, after which absolutely nothing can stand in the way of popular election of Senators.

I presume the Senator will respond that while he believes in popular election of Senators he prefers to accomplish this reform by constitutional amendment and not by the enactment of State laws which attain the same result, though without the sanction of the United States Constitution. If the Senator protests against the policy of securing popular election of Senators without first amending the Federal Constitution, I direct his attention to the fact that the Constitution requires that Presidents and Vice Presidents shall be elected by presidential electors chosen by the people of the several States. The Constitution contemplates that these presidential electors should exercise their own discretion in voting for candidates for President and Vice President. Notwithstanding this provision, we have by custom, and without any law, established the practice of instructing our presidential electors so that in casting their ballots they do not exercise their own discretion, but merely record the wishes of the people of their several States. Oregon has followed exactly the same method, but by law rather than custom, in election of United States Senators. If any man protests against this method of selecting Senators without first amending the United States Constitution, why does he not also protest against the established custom of popular election of Presidents when the Constitution as originally written, and as it stands to-day, provides and contemplates that Presidents and Vice Presidents shall be elected by a body of men known as presidential electors?

WISDOM OF THE PEOPLE ACKNOWLEDGED.

In pointing out what he considered defects in the initiative and referendum, the Senator said, among other things, that a change of 11,000 votes would have adopted a certain measure in Oregon which he believes to be unwise. His intended criticism is, in reality, an indorsement of the system of popular vote, for in the instance which he mentions the people defeated by 11,000 majority the bill which the Senator says should have been defeated. The Senator acknowledges that the people demonstrated their ability to act intelligently even upon a very complex measure.

But if it is a valid criticism of the initiative that a change of 11,000 votes would have adopted a measure which was in reality defeated, let us see where that line of argument brings us. There are plenty of instances in the records of this body in which bad measures have been defeated, but would have been adopted by a change of a half dozen or, perhaps, by the change of a single vote. On a very notable occasion the Supreme Court of the United States had before it the question of the constitutionality of an income tax. After exhaustive argument by the ablest attorneys the court stood four to four, with one member absent who believed the law constitutional. Later the case was given a rehearing, and, with all members of the court present, one of the members who formerly held the law constitutional changed his attitude, and by a vote of five to four the court held the income tax unconstitutional. Reduced to its essentials, the situation was this: At one time the income-tax law was, in the opinion of the majority of the Supreme Court, constitutional, but a few weeks later that same law, by reason of a change of a single vote, became unconstitutional.

If it is a valid argument against the initiative and referendum to say that a change of 11,000 votes would have changed the result on the adoption of a measure submitted, is it not as valid an argument against the existence of a legislative body or a Supreme Court to say that a change of one vote would change the result upon a bill presented or change the decision of the court in a case that had been argued and submitted. The Senator's argument naturally leads to the supposition that he would abolish the Supreme Court.

A PRACTICAL DEMONSTRATION.

The failure of the Senator to comprehend the practical operation of the initiative and referendum is illustrated by his attempted ridicule of my assertion that in the composite action of the people under the initiative selfishness is worn away and general welfare is substituted therefor. Evidently without knowing he was doing so, he cited an unquestionable instance of the elimination of selfishness and the substitution of general welfare. The case referred to was the submission of two Columbia River fishery bills to the people of Oregon in 1908. The rival fishing interests—the gill-net fishermen on the lower river and the fish-wheel operators on the upper river—had conducted their work so effectively as to threaten ruin of the industry by destruction of the fish before they could reach the natural spawning grounds. Almost every two years the rival fishing interests had carried their fight to the State legislature, and the legislature failed to enact any adequate legislation for the protection of the natural supply of fish. The State was maintaining hatcheries for the artificial propagation of salmon, but notwithstanding the maintenance of this work the fish supply was steadily diminishing.

Believing that they could promote their own selfish interests and eliminate their rivals by resort to the initiative, the fish-wheel operators of the upper river proposed a bill practically prohibiting gill-net fishing on the lower river, and the gill-net fishermen proposed a bill prohibiting fish-wheel operations on the upper river. These two measures, each initiated by selfish interests, were submitted to a vote of the people. During the campaign the rival interests presented their arguments, not only through the publicity pamphlet but through the newspapers and by circular letters. The people of the State gave the matter careful consideration, and, believing that the general welfare required that the fish themselves be protected from extermination, they adopted both bills.

The people having temporarily terminated fishing on the Columbia River, the legislature, which had theretofore failed to do its duty, responded to the popular will and enacted a law which permits fishing within reasonable regulation, but provides opportunity for the fish during closed seasons to reach their natural spawning grounds. I thank the Senator from Utah for calling attention in his speech to this instance in which the composite citizen, acting under the initiative, eliminated selfish interests and substituted general welfare.

OHIO AND ILLINOIS VOTE SELLING.

Having shown that this effort of the Senator to criticize the operation of the initiative is plainly a commendation, I will furnish the Senator with what at first blush might seem to be an actual rather than an imaginary weakness in the desirability of popular government, namely, the wholesale bartering of votes in Adams County, Ohio, and Danville, Ill. Hasty consideration of these two instances would lead to the belief that the people are unworthy of the trust imposed in them in the exercise of the elective franchise. Careful study and deduction, however, demonstrate the desirability of the earliest possible adoption of the popular-government laws in both Ohio and Illinois as a remedy for just such conditions as are evidenced by the wholesale bartering of votes.

The voters of Adams County, Ohio, and Danville, Ill., had for years witnessed the operation of machine politics. Because they had only the opportunity to vote for one of two candidates selected for them by political bosses dominating each of the two great political parties in that community, the voters felt their utter helplessness. Self-respect was finally obliterated, honor blunted, moral fiber destroyed, and selfishness intensified. They realized that they must vote for one of two candidates, both of whom represented selfish interests, and they naturally concluded that they might as well benefit themselves for the day by taking the few paltry dollars for the surrender of what little valueless right they had. They felt that the exercise of the right to vote for one of two candidates in the selection of neither of whom they had any choice was of little concern to them, and that sale of their votes was so much gained in cash without any loss in public service.

Are these conditions favorable to the development of individuals or communities? No. I advocate destruction of these conditions and substitution of powers and corresponding responsibilities providing a limitless field for individual development.

ADDITIONAL FREEDOM BRINGS DEVELOPMENT.

Enjoyment of any additional freedom given to humanity is always followed by a growing realization of the added responsibility, resulting inevitably in the steady development not only of the individual units of society, but of the community as a whole, and the production of a national, state, and community electorate infinitely higher in efficiency.

When popular government has been established in Ohio and Illinois, practically every voter will realize that his ballot counts for something, and he will esteem it so highly and guard it so sacredly that no amount of money or other corrupting consideration will purchase it for any purpose.

While I would not say anything that could be construed as approval of the citizens of Adams County, Ohio, and Danville, Ill., who sold their votes, I can readily understand how they excuse themselves after having witnessed the barter and sale of votes in legislative halls and the use of patronage for the purpose of influencing votes in Congress. Two wrongs will not make a right, but those who condemn the barter and sale of votes among people who have not gone beyond the multiplication table should be as loud in their denunciation of purchase and sale of votes among those who have mastered the problems of Euclid.

IMPOSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENT A MERIT.

Objection is made to the initiative because a measure submitted to the people is not subject to amendment, but must be adopted or rejected exactly as submitted. Experience with legislatures indicates that this is a merit rather than a fault of direct legislation. Many times in Oregon, and, I think, in other States, bills have been carefully prepared upon important subjects, such as taxation, road construction, education, and forest preservation, and when thus prepared have been introduced in the legislature.

The bills had been drafted by men who gave months of careful study to the questions involved. Nevertheless, when the measures came up for consideration, amendments were proposed indiscriminately by men who had not studied the subjects, and as a result when finally passed the bills bore slight resemblance to their original form. Even the authors would not recognize them, and sometimes they were so inconsistent in their own provisions as to be in direct conflict. Moreover it was sometimes discovered, several months after the legislature adjourned, that some shrewd but unscrupulous legislator had cunningly inserted an amendment of the character commonly called a "joker," which the legislature, with all its boasted intelligence, did not detect. Measures submitted under the initiative and referendum can not be emasculated by haphazard amendment nor be made the agency for enactment of "jokers."

Several men acting together prepare bills for submission under the initiative, and they are not submitted until every phase of the subject is fully considered. The bills correctly present the subject matter, and must, as they should, be adopted or rejected as a whole. Any measure which contains objectionable provisions will, of course, be defeated, for free discussion for four months will certainly disclose any unwise feature.

CARELESSNESS REDUCED TO A MINIMUM.

All conditions and circumstances of direct legislation tend to prevent careless or ill-advised action. No man wishes to suffer the humiliation of defeat, hence none will participate in drafting a bill which is not likely to find favor with the people. Pride in his own achievements will induce a man to put forth his best effort and to secure the advice and assistance of capable friends in preparation of a measure which he believes should be submitted to a vote of the people. No man desires to bear the ignominy incident to association of his name with vicious or foolish legislation, consequently evil measures will find no sponsors of standing sufficient to make their success probable.

LEGISLATURES MAKE MISTAKES.

Under the Oregon plan the study of measures submitted under the initiative and referendum is made convenient by the publication of a pamphlet containing a full copy of each measure submitted, together with arguments pro and con. A copy of this pamphlet is mailed to every registered voter 55 days before election. The interest of the people in good government, comment through newspapers, informal discussion among friends and in public debate, will give the people a thorough understanding of questions presented. On several occasions Oregon legislatures have made such serious mistakes in laws enacted that special sessions were necessary to correct the errors. No special sessions have been called to correct errors of the people, nor will there ever be.

Four months of discussion, in which all the people participate, is far preferable to 40 days of consideration in a legislature where much of the discussion takes place in the secrecy of a committee room or the private apartments of a paid lobbyist.

ARIZONA CONSTITUTION A STATE QUESTION.

Mr. President, on a previous occasion on the floor of this body the Senator from Utah said:

I will go as far as he who will go farthest in standing for the integrity of the various States of this Union. In matters which concern the States alone I think the Federal Government should keep its hands off.

In all his remarks the Senator from Utah did not point out a single particular in which the initiative, referendum, and recall, if adopted in Arizona, would affect the Federal Government in the least. The initiative and referendum relate only to State legislation; the recall provides only for the recall of officers elected by the people of the State. In operating under the initiative, referendum, and recall the people of Arizona will consider only their own local State affairs. That this is entirely a local problem has been asserted by the associate editor of the Outlook, former President Theodore Roosevelt, after extensive study of the question. Like myself, Col. Roosevelt asserts that Arizona should be left free to shape her own constitution so far as it relates to State affairs.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will inquire if the Senator objects to an interruption?

Mr. BOURNE. I would prefer to wait until after the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was at this point if at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon will proceed.

Mr. BOURNE. I therefore call upon the Senator from Utah to make good his assertion that he will go as far as he who will go farthest in standing for the integrity of the various States of this Union, and I hope he will not quibble by saying that Arizona is a Territory and not yet a State and that it is proper for the Federal Government to violate the integrity of a State at the time of its admission, which violation would remain as a hindrance to good government in that State after it had been admitted to the Union. Let us not quibble over technicalities, Mr. President, but deal with this question on the broad basis of fundamental principles.

THE ARIZONA POPULAR-GOVERNMENT CAMPAIGN.

Mr. President, the general subject upon which the Senator spoke was the admission of the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, but he devoted his attention to only three phases of the Arizona constitution and one feature of the New Mexico constitution. In addition to making reply to his remarks upon these topics, I desire to set forth my own attitude toward the admission of Arizona, which question, it appears, is the only cause of real controversy.

Immediately after the passage of the act of Congress known as the enabling act, authorizing the holding of a constitutional convention in Arizona, members of both political parties in that Territory asked me to assist in their campaign for the election of convention delegates favorable to the popular-government ideas. I rendered assistance by advice and the circulation of literature giving information on the practical operation of the Oregon system, and was pleased to learn that the election resulted in the choice of delegates, a large majority of whom were pledged to support the initiative and referendum and the recall. Be it said to their credit, the delegates faithfully fulfilled their pledges, and the constitution was drafted in accordance with the expressed wishes of the people of the Territory.

Enemies of popular government, however, would not yield when thus defeated, but tried by every means in their power to prevent adoption of the constitution when submitted to a vote in February, 1911. Because of the bitterness of the fight that was being made and because of the part taken by me in the campaign for election of delegates, several citizens of Arizona wrote me asking my views upon the question of adoption of the constitution by the people of the Territory. Among others who thus addressed me was Hon. George W. P. Hunt, who had served as president of the constitutional convention. My reply to him set forth as clearly as I was able the opinions I entertained, and since my views are the same now as then, I shall read the letter I wrote to Mr. Hunt:

LETTER TO THE PEOPLE OF ARIZONA.

WASHINGTON, December 29, 1910.

Hon. GEO. W. P. HUNT, Globe, Ariz.

MY DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter inclosing a copy of the constitution drafted by the Arizona constitutional convention, of which you were president, and I note your desire for an expression of my views regarding the same, my opinions being desired for publication. I have received letters from other prominent residents of Arizona making a similar request, and for convenience shall make my letter to you an answer to all and send each a copy of this letter.

You say that a fight has developed against the adoption of the constitution by the people at the election on February 9, and I am advised by others that the principal objection to it is the popular-government features, comprising the initiative and referendum and the recall. One of your citizens informs me that the assertion has been made that the President will disapprove the constitution because these provisions have been incorporated in it, and, because of fear of such action on his part, some favor the rejection of the constitution by the people on February 9, in hope of hastening statehood by such a course.

At the outset let me say that the question whether the President will or will not approve the constitution should be wholly immaterial. The people of Arizona have wisely incorporated in their constitution provisions which permit them to control legislation and keep their public servants accountable to them. This principle is fundamentally and eternally right, and the people of Arizona should adhere to it, even if they thereby forfeit statehood forever. They had better lose statehood than yield their right to control their State government. What a mockery it is to start a constitution with a preamble declaring, "We, the people of Arizona, grateful to Almighty God for our liberties," and then harbor for an instant the thought of surrendering or limiting that God-given liberty at the instance of any man who happens to occupy temporarily the office of President.

Dictation from one man at Washington should be as distasteful to the people of Arizona as dictation from London was to the American colonists; and no sovereignty should be recognized except the sovereignty of the people, who express their will through the Federal and State constitutions and statutes. If the people of Arizona are so craven in spirit or so doubtful of their own intelligence and their own ability to govern themselves as to consider the elimination of the popular-government features of their new constitution, then I shall be doubtful of their fitness for statehood. Entertaining as I do these views of the right of the people of Arizona to control their own State affairs, I do not deem it proper to discuss the possibility of the disapproval of the constitution by the President.

PEOPLE WON AGAINST POLITICIANS.

As already stated, in my opinion the people of Arizona acted wisely in making the initiative and referendum and recall a part of their constitution. I am informed that during the campaign for the election of delegates to the constitutional convention a prominent Federal official went to Arizona and endeavored to prevent the election of delegates favorable to these features of popular government, and that funds from unknown sources were supplied to defray the expense of employing outsiders to canvass the Territory in opposition to the initiative and referendum in particular. Letters were published in Arizona over the signature of a discredited machine politician in Oregon advising the people of Arizona to "avoid the initiative as you would the plague." Notwithstanding these influences, be it said to the credit of your people, they elected delegates favorable to popular government, and, as a consequence, your proposed constitution reserves to the people the power to control legislation and to discharge unfaithful public servants.

The action of your people was guided largely by the experience of the people of Oregon, who have now enjoyed popular government for eight years. You were wise in following such guidance, for in the past eight years the people of Oregon have voted upon a total of 64 measures submitted to popular vote and have not made a single mistake, while they have in numerous instances secured advanced legislation which they could not secure from the legislature, and have defeated a number of unwise acts passed by the legislature.

The Oregon system, which your constitutional convention adopted in part, is not a theory; it is a demonstrated success. That our people are satisfied is proved conclusively by their action in the recent election, when, by a vote of 23,000 for to nearly 60,000 against, they defeated an act of the legislature calling a constitutional convention to revise the constitution, the understanding being that such convention would probably eliminate the initiative and referendum or limit its use. Instead of consenting to a diminution of their power, the people voted to increase their power by adopting an initiative measure, proposed by myself, giving the people an opportunity in the direct primaries to express their choice for party candidates for President and Vice President and to elect delegates to national conventions and nominate candidates for presidential electors. Hereafter the people of Oregon and not the political bosses will instruct delegates to national conventions whom to support for party candidates for President and Vice President. In my opinion the people of other States will demand and secure similar power, in which event the steam roller will be relegated to the political scrap heap and its operators to the shadow of things forgotten.

OREGON RECALL SATISFACTORY.

I am advised that your recall clause is deemed objectionable because it applies to the judiciary as well as to legislative and executive officers. In this particular it is the same as our Oregon recall provision, and Oregon has not found it unsatisfactory. I am sure there is no man on the bench in Oregon who would hesitate to submit his record for honesty and efficiency to the people whom he serves, and I hope you will never be so unfortunate in Arizona as to place upon the bench a man who would have less confidence in the honesty and fairness of the people or the honesty and efficiency of his own service.

I see no reason why a man who occupies a judicial position should be governed by laws on standards of public service different from those which apply to legislative or executive officers. Judges are but human. We sometimes elect legislators to the bench, send former judges to the legislature, and place judges in executive positions, even elevating them to the highest executive office in the land. Does a man change his standards of ethics when he changes his office? I think not. A man who is dishonest or incompetent in an executive or legislative office will as likely be dishonest or incompetent in a judicial office. A man who would use his power as an executive in an improper manner or for improper purposes would exercise judicial power in the same way. In any branch of the Government he is a servant of the people, not their master; and he should be subject to dismissal by the people after fair opportunity to be heard upon his record.

THE PEOPLE ARE LONG-SUFFERING.

Opponents of the recall represent that under its provisions public officials will be subjected to constant harassment and obliged to bear the expense and endure the trouble of frequent campaigns. Experience in Oregon disproves this. The world's history shows that the people are long-suffering and will bear many ills rather than enforce a change. No attempt has yet been made to recall a State or county officer in Oregon, and there have been very few instances in which the recall has been exercised against city officers. The people are always advocates of a square deal, and will not give their approval to efforts to recall an officer for factional or selfish reasons.

You and others have asked for my opinion of your constitution in general; but from letters received I judge that the only question raised is in regard to the popular-government features, and hence I have confined my attention to these.

You will understand that I can not answer the question that has been asked me regarding the probable action of the President, except to give my personal opinion. I believe that when the people of any proposed State have deliberated and decided what form of constitution they wish to adopt, no President will set up his judgment against the judgment of the entire people of the Commonwealth, especially when the people have decided that they wish to retain control of legislation rather than turn it over entirely to legislatures too often influenced by selfish interests antagonistic to extension of the people's power.

Yours, very truly, JONATHAN BOURNE, Jr.

Since the date of this letter there has been discussion of the recall of a district judge in Oregon, but thus far no recall petition has been filed.

APPLICATION OF RECALL TO JUDICIARY.

Mr. President, objection is made to the admission of Arizona because its constitution contains the recall provision. The particular point of objection is that the recall applies to the judiciary as well as to executive, administrative, and legislative officers. The great fear is that constant accountability to the people of the State will exercise an improper influence upon the courts.

To my mind this objection is untenable. As I said recently in an article in the Saturday Evening Post, if the people of Arizona or any other State are competent to elect their judges and can be trusted to act fairly and honestly in the election, they can also be trusted in the exercise of the recall power. The Arizona constitution, like that of nearly every other State, provides for the election of judges by the people. Those who oppose the power of the people to recall a judge should—in order to be consistent—also oppose the power to elect judges in the first instance.

The people of a State or district elect a man to a judicial position, because they believe he will serve the general welfare. They elect him in anticipation of good service and they would recall him only for demonstrated bad service. The assumption that the people would recall a judge without reason—for the gratification of spite or while they were under the impulse of passion—is without justification. The American people never act in such a way when given an opportunity to act in a lawful and considerate manner.

OPPOSITION IS AN INSULT TO JUDICIARY.

Men who profess opposition to the recall as applied to the judiciary for fear judges will be improperly influenced by public opinion do not realize that they are offering a greater insult to the judiciary than the advocates of the recall could possibly offer. Advocates of the recall have confidence in the judiciary in general; but they recognize the fact, demonstrated by experience, that human frailty exists in judges as in other men.

To assert that judges are above corruption or improper prejudice and that they are always efficient public servants is too absurd for serious consideration. The men who sit on the bench to-day were boys when members of the legislative branch of government were boys. They were no better or worse on the average than we. In childhood and young manhood we mingled on an equality, enjoyed the same sports, received instructions in the same schools, were taught the same religious principles, were subjected to the same temptations, indulged in the same vices, and cherished the same ambitions. Upon what reasoning, then, can it be asserted that the boy who studied law and found such favor in the eyes of the political boss as to secure a nomination for the bench is superior in either efficiency or honesty to his brother who entered business and was slated by the same boss for a position in the executive or legislative branch of government? Let us look at this subject from a common-sense viewpoint.

There hangs no halo of sanctity around the head of the judiciary, except as unthinking men concede a sacredness which the legal profession has assumed for occupants of the bench. Judges, like all other men in public or private life, are generally honest. Their failure, in exceptional instances, to serve faithfully the people by whom they are employed is due to the same cause to which may be attributed similar failure on the part of other public servants. This cause is the unrepresentative system by which they are chosen.

INFLUENCE OF POLITICAL BOSS OVER JUDGES.

Opponents of the extension of the recall to the judiciary profess great fear that judges will listen to what they call public clamor and will render decisions against justice in order to avoid public displeasure. How strange that this fear of improper influence has been so long suppressed! In every State where the convention system is in vogue political machines exist, with political bosses in control. The political bosses maintain their machine organizations by means of funds contributed by individuals having special interests to promote or protect. Where the convention system exists the successful candidate for nomination for judicial position must have the active or passive support of the political boss. Special privilege is as much interested in the judiciary as in any other branch of government. Though it may be true that in most cases there is no express agreement between the political boss and the candidate for a judicial nomination, any man with the least knowledge of human nature knows that the political boss will aid in securing the nomination of the candidate who seems most likely to be satisfactory to his backers.

Under that same convention system the man once elected judge must look to the political boss for his renomination for a second term. Will anyone say that a judge who will listen to popular clamor will not also yield to the wishes and interests of the political boss? And, if the judge must be subject to influences controlling his election or retention in office, which presents the greater danger, the influence of popular will or the influence of the political boss?

It is useless for men to hold up their hands in horror and assert that the judiciary is above the influence of the political boss. If the judiciary is above that influence it is certainly also above the influence of popular clamor, and the argument against the recall falls to the ground.

BUSINESS METHODS APPLIED TO GOVERNMENT.

Adoption of the recall is nothing more than the application of good business principles to Government affairs. Every wise employer reserves the right to discharge an employee whenever the service rendered is unsatisfactory. The right of the employer to discharge his employee rests upon exactly the same basis as the right of the employee to quit. The principle is recognized throughout the business world, and it is put in practice by every large and successful corporation.

Consider the absurdity of the recognition of the right of a public officer to quit his position at any time and the denial of the right of his employers to discharge him. To assert the right in one instance and deny it in the other is to maintain a one-sided contract, the discrimination being against the whole people and in favor of the individual. If we can trust an individual to deal justly with the people when he considers tendering his resignation, we can also trust the people to deal justly with a public servant when they consider discharging him.

Members of this body have the right to resign at will. If a Senator can be trusted to promote the public welfare by tendering his resignation or not tendering it, can not the people of his State be trusted to promote the public welfare by recalling him or not recalling when the question is placed before them in lawful manner? I have the right and power to quit my office at pleasure; the people of my State should have equal right and power to discharge me from office whenever they believe they can be more faithfully and more effectively represented by another in my stead.

It is generally conceded that the American people have intelligence and honesty enough to be trusted with the power to select their public servants, even to choose a President of the United States. If it be granted that the people have intelligence enough to choose a President of the United States, no man can consistently contend that they have not the intelligence to act wisely upon the question of discharging a State, county, or municipal officer. I think no one proposes, at present, to extend the recall to any Federal official except those elected by the people of the several States.

PEOPLE DESIRE ONLY GOOD SERVICE.

All that is desired by the people of any State, county, or city is good service for the general welfare. They will never make a change unless satisfied that it will be a change for the better, hence they will never discharge a public servant unless convinced that his successor will be a more faithful and efficient public official. They have a right to improve their government, or try to do so, if they see an opportunity. The interests of one individual must not stand in the way of better government.

We have heard much in recent weeks about the "rule of the mob" in connection with the initiative and referendum and the recall. Those who wish to do so may refer to the people of their States as "the mob," but the record of the people of Oregon precludes the application of such a term to them. The nearest approach to mob rule in Oregon has been in legislative halls, where the members violated the plain provisions of the constitution of the State, and where many of them ignored the popular will, though it had been definitely expressed by the people of the State through the enactment of statutes.

THE PEOPLE NOT A MOB.

A mob is a body of men acting against law, order, and justice. Legislatures sometimes do this—the people never, if given an opprotunity to act in a lawful way. I grant that where wrongs have been long imposed and remedies have been denied the people finally resort to force to redress their grievances, just as they did in the American Revolution. Resort to force came only after every peaceful means had been tried in vain and when longer endurance was impossible.

To some this is mob action. I am disposed to give it a higher characterization; and though it is an overthrow of existing authority, I regard it as the establishment of law and order in the highest sense. When the people of a republic, exercising their inherent right to change their laws and constitutions, vote to adopt new and better systems of government, I deny that this is mob action; it is the establishment of law and order. The overthrow of a misrepresentative system, maintained by political machines enjoying dictatorial powers and the substitution of a truly representative system means the attainment of higher standards of human justice and equality, and, consequently, of a more peaceful and more nearly perfect government. The voice of the people should be the law of the land, and since the initiative and referendum and the recall register the voice of the people, they are the best mediums for the establishment of the best governmental principles.

DANGER OF INTELLECTUAL SUBSERVIENCE.

We have legal prohibition against personal, physical slavery, and a territory recognizing such slavery would be denied any sort of connection with the Union. And yet an unwilling physical slave is a lesser menace to good government than a willing intellectual slave. We have witnessed in this free America instances of political subserviency as despicable as any that ever existed in mediæval times. We have seen States in which the supposedly sovereign people quietly acquiesced in the continuance in power of political bosses, who, through political machines, maintained despotic rule. These bosses, through the mechanism of the convention system, nominated candidates to suit themselves, and gave the people power merely to ratify their action. These same bosses controlled State legislatures, and thereby made the laws; they controlled nominations of judges, and thereby exercised undue influence over interpretation of the laws; they controlled the nominations of executives, from governor to constable, and of prosecuting attorneys and police-court officials, thereby supervising enforcement of the laws. In no way does government such as this differ materially from despotism.

PEOPLE OF ARIZONA NOT POLITICAL SERFS.

It is true that even under the convention system the people have the power to overthrow one boss and accept the dominion of another, just as the people of an absolute monarchy have power to overthrow one king and place another upon the throne. In either case the people who submit to that system of government are lacking in the intelligence or the manhood to assert the right with which they were endowed by the Creator. They are political serfs, claiming the pity, but not the approval, of thinking men.

Of no such class, however, are the people of Arizona. They had an opportunity to continue in the control of political dictators. It would have been easier and less costly in time, effort, and money if they had permitted the bosses to select their delegates and make their new constitution. Thus they could have hastened statehood. They could have basked in the smile of an approving administration and would have been given a patronizing pat on their bowed heads by the representatives of special privilege; but personal ease and smiles and pats were not their desire. Their ambition was to enjoy all the rights of sovereign citizenship. With clearness of purpose and courage of conviction which command the admiration of all liberty-loving people they made the fight for political freedom and won the battle against tremendous odds.

CHARACTER OF PEOPLE MOST IMPORTANT.

Area in square miles, commercial wealth, number of inhabitants, and industrial development are all matters that should be taken into consideration when a Territory seeks admission to the Union as a State. These are important because they have a bearing upon the material welfare and prosperity of the people and affect their ability to maintain a State government. And yet they are all relatively of slight significance as compared with the character of the people who make up the citizenship of the Territory.

As to the character of men who constitute the voting population of Arizona there can be no doubt. The record of the two elections—first for the selection of delegates and then for the ratification of the constitution—leaves no chance for uncertainty. The people of Arizona are a thinking people. They are interested in the problems of government and are devoted to the advancement of general welfare.

They have confidence in their own intelligence and their own ability to think and act for themselves, and they have too much independence to submit to dictation from others. They have the courage to assert themselves and the patriotism to sacrifice even statehood, if necessary, rather than yield their political principles. Their admission to all the privileges of American citizenship will be an honor to the Union; refusal to admit them would be a national disgrace.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, a word before the Senator leaves the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. I inquired of the Senator whether he desired to be interrupted, and he indicated that he did not. My inquiry is in connection with the statement made by the Senator that the recall did not interest this body except as it affected judges. Has the Senator given attention to the provision in regard to the recall of members of the legislature? I called attention yesterday to it, but the Senator was not present. Section 5 of article 8 of the proposed constitution of Arizona provides:

SEC. 5. No recall petition shall be circulated against any officer until he shall have held his office for a period of six months, except that it may be filed against a member of the legislature at any time after five days from the beginning of the first session after his election.

I suggested yesterday that that provision might be used to destroy a legislative body and prevent the election of a United States Senator. Petitions could be circulated in advance and be kept in hand ready to file against enough members of the legislature to destroy the opposition or break a quorum, because, under the provisions of this proposed constitution, the filing of the petition terminates the service of the officer against whom it is filed. No action is required to give it further force. Does it not appear to the Senator that in that way that provision interests this body very much, that it is very far-reaching, and that it might result in the defeat of any election at all?

Mr. BOURNE. Has the Senator finished?

Mr. HEYBURN. I have been asking a question, and I have finished asking it.

Mr. BOURNE. I will say, Mr. President, that I think the fears of the Senator from Idaho in this particular are entirely groundless. In the first place, it takes 25 per cent of the electorate to initiate a recall proceeding. That 25 per cent of the electorate of the State are going to band themselves together for the purpose of the initiation of recall petitions so as to defeat the election of a United States Senator seems, to my mind, entirely preposterous. It is impossible.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let me state that it does not require 25 per cent of the electorate of the State, but of the legislative district or county.

Mr. BOURNE. I am quite familiar, I think, with the provision regarding the initiative and recall.

Mr. HEYBURN. It will only require 25 per cent of the voters of enough of the legislative districts or counties to effect the result.

Mr. BOURNE. Then the Senator would have to assume that a selfish interest would dominate half of the legislative districts of the State and half of the electorate in those districts before the fear that he anticipates could possibly materialize, which is an impossibility.

Mr. HEYBURN. It requires a majority to elect a man to the legislature, but it only requires 25 per cent of the vote to deprive him of his office.

Mr. BOURNE. The Senator is mistaken. It requires 25 per cent of the vote by which he was elected to initiate recall proceedings, and then a majority vote to effect his recall.

Mr. HEYBURN. The proposed constitution does not so read. It is not a question of the initiative. The filing of the petition completes the withdrawal—so the constitution provides. This is the language——

Mr. LOURNE. Mr. President, I have a copy of the constitution of Arizona here.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have it before me.

Mr. BOURNE. But I think, if the Senator will read the whole provision, he will see that he is mistaken.

Mr. HEYBURN. Section 1 of article 8 provides:

SEC. 1. Every public officer in the State of Arizona holding an elective office, either by election or appointment, is subject to recall from such office by the qualified electors of the electoral district from which candidates are elected to such office. Such electoral district may include the whole State. Such number of said electors as shall equal 25 per cent of the number of votes cast at the last preceding general election for all of the candidates for the office held by such officer may by petition, which shall be known as a recall petition, demand his recall.

Mr. BOURNE. If the Senator will look at section 4——

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I will read section 4 in connection with that:

SEC. 4. Unless he otherwise request, in writing, his name shall be placed as a candidate on the official ballot without nomination.

That is, after the filing of the recall petition.

Other candidates for the office may be nominated to be voted for at said election.

That is, after the recall is perfected, and the recall is perfected by the filing of the petition signed by the specified proportion of voters.

Mr. BOURNE. The recall is simply initiated, Mr. President.

Mr. HEYBURN. Not according to the language of that constitution.

Mr. BOURNE. The recall is only vitalized by the action of the majority of the voters in the district in which the officer was elected. Section 4 will give the Senator information in regard to that matter.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am reading from section 4. The filing of the petition completes the recall and puts in motion the machinery for another election. The members of the legislature necessary to be removed in order to effect any purpose would be attacked by the recall petition, and would then be out of office.

Mr. BOURNE. No.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; and within not less than 20 nor more than 30 days an election to fill their places is held; and they may or may not be candidates. The result being determined by a new election, the others elected in their place could be attacked in exactly the same way after five days. So you may attack each succeeding member of the legislature after he has been in office five days. That would be before the election of a Senator could possibly take place.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BOURNE. I will say that I think the Senator has failed to read all of section 3, which provides:

SEC. 3. If said officer shall offer his resignation, it shall be accepted—

That is, upon the initiation of recall proceedings——

Mr. HEYBURN. That is after the recall petition has been filed.

Mr. BOURNE. After 25 per cent of the voters have filed the petition.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BOURNE. I will again read from the beginning of section 3:

If said officer shall offer his resignation, it shall be accepted, and the vacancy shall be filled as may be provided by law. If he shall not resign within five days after a recall petition is filed, a special election shall be ordered to be held, not less than 20 nor more than 30 days after such order, to determine whether such officer shall be recalled.

If he shall not resign, he is not removed. The constitution there contemplates specifically his resignation. The rest of the paragraph, I think, will eliminate any doubt in the Senator's mind on the point he is attempting to make. It provides:

On the ballots at said election shall be printed the reasons, as set forth in the petition, for demanding his recall, and, in not more than 200 words, the officer's justification of his course in office. He shall continue to perform the duties of his office until the result of said election shall have been officially declared.

Mr. HEYBURN. His successor may be elected 20 days after the petition is filed, according to the plain text of the provision.

Mr. BOURNE. Yes; if there is a special election called. I do not see at all the point the Senator makes.

Mr. HEYBURN. The point is that a man's term of office may be limited absolutely to 25 days by the provisions of this proposed constitution. He must be in office 5 days before his rights are attacked.

Mr. BOURNE. That is, a member of the legislature?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I am talking about the legislature.

Mr. BOURNE. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. And then at the end of 20 days after the 5 days his successor may be elected.

Mr. BOURNE. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Against that successor the same proceeding may be repeated just as often as you choose. In that way——

Mr. BOURNE. For what purpose would the people of a legislative district do so—for amusement? Would that be the object on their part?

Mr. HEYBURN. This does not limit it, and as I suggested yesterday, it might be because they did not like his complexion. The proposed constitution does not state upon what grounds a man may be removed at all. It simply says he may be removed, and the petition will state the ground; but the law does not state what shall be sufficient grounds for his removal.

Mr. BOURNE. In my opinion, it should not, either.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let me call the Senator's attention to a little practical application of that. I have a case of recall here, one that has taken place within a month, and it may interest the Senator. I called attention to it yesterday, but the Senator was not present.

I am reading the record of the proceedings in a city where the recall obtains. It is directed against the mayor. Now, these are the grounds, and I assume that all of these organizations act along the same lines. Dr. J. T. Woods was mayor. The local—that is the name of the organization of the socialists; they call it a local; they have a local; and then they have other branches—the local gives him the alternative of resigning or doing certain things. They demand, first, that he be removed.

I will ask the attention of the Senator from Oregon, because it is to his remarks that I direct these suggestions.

This organization, acting along the lines proposed for the Legislature of Arizona, demands—

1. The removal of George Evans as acting chief of police.
2. The temporary appointment of John Flemming as chief of police.
3. The removal of City Gardener William Degner.
4. The appointment of C. A. Waters in place of Degner.

I will say that the officers whose removal they demand are not socialists, and the men whose appointment they demand are socialists.

5. The appointment of B. F. Huggins for sanitary police officer.
6. The appointment of A. D. Brown to take the place of Flemming on the police force.

Now, the vote stood in this local 30 to 9 in favor of that demand made upon the mayor.

Mr. BOURNE. What does the local represent?

Mr. HEYBURN. The local represents the organization.

Mr. BOURNE. What organization?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is its name.

Mr. BOURNE. Is this a community that the Senator is talking about?

Mr. HEYBURN. This is the organization of the Socialist Party. They call the organization the local, as applied to that particular jurisdiction.

Now, it was moved and seconded and was carried by a referendum.

Mr. BOURNE. Among the thirty in the local?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; Socialists.

It is claimed the State organizer will be here in the near future, and then things will be doing, and the stillness of the Potomac will be a mere dream.

The local indorsed the publication of a paper in the city.

Now, that occurred on the 6th of June.

I would especially call the attention of the Senators to this. On July 28, a little more than a week ago, the local took final action in regard to this recall. This gives you a splendid opportunity to know how it works.

Mayor Wood is expelled from the Socialist Party by a solid vote of the local. He fails to attend meeting—

He had been notified to attend.

Twenty-five pass upon charges against Dr. ———; principal charge is willful declaration and refusal to comply with the imperative mandates of local.

They had sought to substitute their mandate as to what the mayor of this city, which has something over 7,000 people, should do. They had undertaken to substitute their mandate for the law by which he was being governed. I think this ought to interest those who are flirting with the socialist idea, because it is not a supposititious case. It is a practical demonstration of the way socialism works, and so far as I am concerned, it is the first opportunity I have had to know exactly what they meant by their general statements and declarations.

Now, to recur for a minute to the question of recall of members of the legislature and the effect of it; suppose at a sufficient and well selected time before the legislature under the law was to commence voting for United States Senator these recall petitions, 25 per cent only of the several districts, were to be circulated and put conveniently in the inside pocket of some one to file at a time when their effect would be just before the commencement of the performance of this high duty of selecting a United States Senator; what would take place?

Mr. BOURNE. The fears of the Senator from Idaho would be entirely dissipated if they adopted a constitutional amendment for the election of United States Senators by direct vote or if he in his State followed the Oregon system. Then it would be immaterial about the recall petitions. The legislature would simply ratify the action as expressed by the people. The people could not recall themselves.

Mr. HEYBURN. Except in cases of unanimous selection, there is always more than one contestant. Those who sought to defeat one party would probably bring about the recall of enough of that man's supporters to make it impossible that he should be elected. Where, for instance, the majority was 8 or 10 out of possibly over 100 members of the legislature it would not, perhaps, be very difficult to bring about the recall of enough to make it impossible to proceed to the election of a Senator.

Now, does not the Senator think the Senate of the United States is interested in this matter, and that to claim it is nobody's business except that of the people of Arizona, is hardly sustainable? I merely suggest this at the present time because of the statement of the Senator in his remarks. Yesterday I called attention to it briefly, and at a later period during the discussion of this question I shall probably elaborate some upon it.

Then, I should like to know, also, why they departed from the usual language in such cases. I will inquire as to the purpose of this departure. Take section 1 of article 8. What was the purpose in using the word "in" in the statement "every public officer in the State of Arizona holding an elective office"? Was it to avoid the use of the ordinary word "of," in order that a question might be raised as to whether or not Members of Congress should be included within this recall provision?

Mr. BOURNE. I have no knowledge as to that.

Mr. HEYBURN. I inferred from what the Senator read as to his connection with the making of this constitution, and the advice that he had given, that he was thoroughly advised as to every motive——

Mr. BOURNE. No.

Mr. HEYBURN. In connection with that question——

Mr. BOURNE. The Senator from Idaho misunderstood my position. I stated specifically to what extent I had been instrumental, that I had been asked advice and had given it, and had sent down to the Territory literature showing what Oregon had accomplished and demonstrated. It was largely instrumental, as I am advised, in the making of the constitution.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is quite an interesting inquiry, as to whether it was intended to open this wide enough to include the recall of Members of Congress.

Mr. BOURNE. Let me ask the Senator, without a constitutional amendment would a recall proceeding apply to Members of Congress?

Mr. HEYBURN. It can not do it by a constitutional amendment.

Mr. BOURNE. Then what are the Senator's fears in regard to the use of a word of two letters—"of" or "in"?

Mr. HEYBURN. I object to language that will result in a controversy of that kind.

Mr. BOURNE. I thought the Senator from Idaho would rather enjoy that.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is another case of misunderstanding.

I merely inquired as to that, as the Senator has stood sponsor for this constitution and at some length and in eloquent phrase has depicted his connection with the making of this constitution and the influence he has exercised in bringing about this result. So it seemed to me rather an appropriate occasion to gather some wisdom by which we might test this constitution. That is all I desired to do at this time.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 2983) for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Thirteenth Census.

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 14) to admit the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona as States into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to inquire whether any Senator is prepared to go ahead with the discussion of the pending joint resolution this afternoon? If not, I want to give notice that on Monday, when the Senate will meet at 10 o'clock, I am going to insist that the joint resolution remain the unfinished business until a vote is taken, and Senators must be prepared to speak upon it if they intend to address the Senate upon that question before a vote.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. In view of what is apparent—that there is no one ready to proceed on the joint resolution this afternoon—I have several very important but very short measures affecting Oklahoma, purely local, recommended by the Interior Department and approved by the Committee on Indian Affairs, which I should like very much to have disposed of. If there be no objection, I should like to ask that the present measure be temporarily laid aside for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In view of the fact that no one seems to be ready to address the Senate upon the statehood joint resolution, I ask that it be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. OWEN. I ask the Senator from Illinois to defer his motion for a moment until the Senate can dispose of this matter. I have been waiting here all day. It is very important to my State, and is a very short matter.

Mr. CULLOM. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois withholds his motion.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN INDIANS.

Mr. OWEN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 49) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to make a per capita payment to the enrolled members of the Five Civilized Tribes entitled to share in the funds of said tribes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. OWEN. I also ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3115) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to withdraw from the Treasury of the United States the funds of the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indians, and for other purposes.

These are very important matters. Those people are suffering from the results of three years of drought, and the Department of the Interior desires to have these bills passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which will be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. I have no desire to object to the consideration of the bill, but it would be a very serious mistake to enact it into law, and I want to oppose it.

Under the bill a million four hundred thousand dollars, which is now in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indians, could be and is intended to be placed in the local banks of Oklahoma to their credit. There are less than 3,000 Indians belonging to those tribes. If a per capita payment was made, it would amount to over $500. That would be twenty-five hundred dollars to a family. Such a large payment would be a very serious mistake.

There is no question but that there has been a drought in that section for the last three years. A per capita payment of $50 should probably be made to the Indians, but it would be a mistake to pay them $500. It would be a mistake to take the money out of the Treasury of the United States, where it is now drawing 5 per cent interest, and put it in the local banks, where, I think, they are limited to the payment of either 3 or 4 per cent.

Mr. OWEN. I do not desire to detain the Senate, if the bill is going to involve discussion. The Secretary of the Interior in his letter has recommended this, but I have not gone into the details of it.

Mr. CURTIS. I have read the letter of the Acting Secretary of the Interior, and I can not see how he could recommend the passage of this bill. He surely did not look into the facts. The superintendent of the Kiowa Agency says in his letter to the Secretary:

> The passage of the bill will prepare the way for the prorating of the Apache, Kiowa, and Comanche 5 per cent funds to men, women, and children.

Mr. OWEN. But the Senator has no question that the Secretary of the Interior did recommend it in this letter?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly he did; but I am giving the facts to the Senate, and I think, in view of the facts, this bill ought not to pass. If it should be amended so as to provide merely for a payment of $50 per capita, it would be different.

Mr. OWEN. I will accept the amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. If the bill were amended so as to provide for a per capita payment of not to exceed $50 per capita——

Mr. OWEN. I accept that. I have no objection to it at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment must be submitted in regular form.

Mr. CURTIS. Then I suggest that the Senator let the matter go over until the next meeting so he may prepare his amendment. There will probably be no objection in the morning hour.

Mr. OWEN. I agree to that. I desire also to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3151) to extend time of payment of balance due for lands sold under act of Congress approved June 17, 1910.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to speak for a minute on the committee amendment. I understand the Secretary recommended that the interest on the deferred payment be fixed at 6 per cent. This amendment places it at 5 per cent. I do not know at this time what interest is being paid by the purchasers. I do think the time for payment ought to be extended, but I also believe that we should adopt the recommendation of the Secretary and make the interest 6 per cent.

Mr. OWEN. I accept that as an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment recommended by the committee.

The SECRETARY. The amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs is, in line 7, on page 1, after the words "nineteen hundred and ten" to insert:

Provided, That such deferred payments shall bear 5 per cent interest.

Mr. CURTIS. I move to amend by striking out "five" and inserting "six."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 7 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, August 7, 1911, at 10 o'clock a. m.

The Senate removed the injunction of secrecy from the arbitration treaties with France and Great Britain.
A convention between the United States and Nicaragua concerning a loan which Nicaragua contemplates making with citizens of the United States.
A convention between the United States and the Republic of Honduras concerning a loan which the Republic contemplates making with citizens of the United States.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, August 5, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.
The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:
Our Father in heaven help us once more to dedicate all that is truest, purest, noblest, best in us to Thee in a faithful and conscientious service to our fellow men, that we may prove ourselves worthy of the dignity Thou hast bestowed upon us as rational beings, gifted with the power of choice, for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.
The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BELL of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point of no quorum. Evidently no quorum is present.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.
The motion was agreed to.
The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors and the Clerk will call the roll.
The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and sixty-eight Members are present—a quorum.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.
The motion was agreed to.
The doors were reopened.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:
H. R. 2983. An act for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Thirteenth Census.

JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following House joint resolution:
H. J. Res. 130. Joint resolution making appropriations for certain expenses of the Senate and House of Representatives incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, and for other purposes.

PORTRAIT OF FORMER SECRETARY OF STATE DAY.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of House resolution 246.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask how much time is left for general debate?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri has 25 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Connecticut 33 minutes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of considerable importance, and I would like to submit a request for unanimous consent that the time for general debate be extended 30 minutes on each side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the order adopted yesterday be so changed as to extend the general debate for one hour.

Mr. HAMLIN. One-half to be controlled by myself and one-half by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

The SPEAKER. One half to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri and the other half by the gentleman from Connecticut. Is there objection?

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the reason the gentleman wants this extension?

Mr. HAMLIN. It is a matter of considerable importance. We originally asked for two hours on each side and felt that we ought to have had it, but the committee cut us down to an hour and a half.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SHARP. That does not affect the extra half hour for consideration of the matter under the five-minute rule?

Mr. HAMLIN. This does not affect that at all. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], my colleague on the committee.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I very much regret that the consideration of this report and resolution was taken up yesterday, for during most of the time of the discussion my presence was imperatively demanded elsewhere. Again, I had no intimation that this matter was to be taken up until some time during next week. Therefore I am somewhat at a loss in attempting to consider much that was then said by those who engaged in the discussion. Some criticism I desire to make concerning statements that were made yesterday by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEDEMEYER]. I may, perhaps, hereafter extend my remarks to include all of the statements he made touching myself, including certain statements contained in the minority report, which he took a prominent part in making. For the present I will content myself with the general statement, that in several places in his remarks he alludes to me in a somewhat caustic and invidious manner as being "wholly of one mind" with the other two Democrats on the committee [laughter]—with the other two members. [Renewed laughter.]

I appreciate that laughter and applause, gentlemen, because I have discovered that there are some pretty good Democrats in the United States, and there are quite a number of them at this time in the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Remember he said, "some."

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. And I believe that the two Democrats with whom I am associated on this "small subcommittee," so termed, are honorable gentlemen, honest in what they undertook to do, and did thorough, conscientious work. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from Michigan, on page 3240 of the RECORD, says:

> In the absence of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], owing to illness, and because of the fact that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] agreed with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN], I was the only Representative left upon the committee to protect the administration and the Department of State as best I knew.

The substance of that statement is repeated many times throughout the gentleman's discourse of yesterday.

Mr. Speaker, the statement that I "agreed with Mr. HAMLIN, the chairman of the committee," is repeated in substance several times by the gentleman in the course of his remarks. Also, that he seemed to consider that he was the sole Representative on the committee whose duty it was to protect the administration and the State Department.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that after several months of careful examination of the matters involved in this report the majority of the committee, including myself, did agree with the chairman, Mr. HAMLIN. In fact, all Members who obtained the facts first handed from the witnesses as they were sworn and testified could honestly arrive at no other conclusion than we did. The difference in the political faith of Mr. HAMLIN and myself did not change the facts, and ought not to change the conclusions. I am also at a loss to comprehend the validity of the gentleman's reason when he said, because of my agreement with Mr. HAMLIN, that he was the only Representative left to "protect the administration and the State Department." Mr. Speaker, I had supposed that this committee was for the purpose of investigating the expenditures in the State Department, but from the gentleman's statement I conclude his theory to be to protect the State Department instead of investigate it.

Mr. Speaker, the minority report which the gentleman signed, and for which I am informed he claims to be the chief author, contains, to my mind, much criticism which is wholly improper, and when directed, as this is, against his colleagues of the House and members of the same committee, very nearly approaches the realm of slander, and a careful reading of it will confirm this statement. In my judgment this minority report is of such a character, in so far as its criticism extends to the majority members, is so uncalled for and improper as to justify the exclusion of it from the records of the House.

On the contrary, the report which the majority of the committee made was couched in courteous and respectful language, and in no manner cast any slurs upon any person whomsoever.

I can not refrain from quoting further from this minority report:

> The report of the majority of the committee is a weak, partisan effort to make scandal. It is an attempt to besmirch the memory of one of our greatest Secretaries of State, the late John Hay, whose shining character and unfailing fairness are in marked contrast with the report of the committee, but whose probity stands too high to be reached by partisan prejudice.

I agree with that portion of the minority report concerning the late Secretary Hay, and assert that he stands too high in the hearts and memory of the people to be besmirched by partisan prejudice and does not need any partisan prejudice in this House or elsewhere to bolster up his reputation. [Applause.]

The minority report further states:

> The effort to condemn Michael without a chance to be heard is itself a scandal. It reaches the lowest depths of unfairness. It shows a biased mind which is not seeking justice. It is an assassination of character from behind.

I am very sorry that the gentleman from Michigan has that opinion of me, or any member of the majority of the committee, but am consoled by the fact, for it is a fact, that his opinion is harmless and discredits no one except himself. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Quoting further from the gentleman's report:

> In fact, we consider the report of the majority a greater reflection upon the fairness and intellectual integrity of those who made it than it is upon the honesty of those whom it condemned.

This statement but emphasizes the gentleman's desperate attempt to glorify Michael and Morrison by casting slurs at his colleagues on the committee. The parliamentary language thus used is of such a character as to warrant some befitting change in our present rules in order to escape condemnation. Referring to the gentleman's speech, this language appears:

> I know of no man here investigating this matter with the sole desire to arrive at the truth and laying aside partisan consideration who can come to any other conclusion than I did, namely, that there is absolutely nothing in these charges.

This is a direct statement that we of the majority have no desire to arrive at the truth and, furthermore, that we were strong partisans. If such partisanship as the gentleman has exhibited is attributed to me, his shaft has missed its mark. Upon all fundamental Republican principles I am a partisan, but I never was and never will be a partisan to such an extent as to favor wrongdoing or in shielding public officials from misconduct in office; but am always a partisan and uncompromising in exposing graft. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I have served on various committees of the House for the past eight years, and during all that time, if any opprobrium has been cast upon me, it has arisen in consequence of my various attempts to dig down into and unearth graft. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

During the beginning of my service I was led to believe that these various standing investigating committees were intended to be and were among the most important standing committees of the House, but until the present Congress I was forced to conclude that they were useless, inactive, and dead, in fact. For eight years I have been a member of one of these various committees, and their only activity consisted in the holding of one meeting at the beginning of a session for the election of a clerk and the distribution of a small amount of stationery among its members. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

At the beginning of this Congress I was placed upon this investigating committee as the ranking minority member, thanks to my friend, the minority leader of the House. I do not think he put me there because I was a prejudiced partisan. I think he put me on this committee for the sole purpose that if any investigation of the expenditures in the Department of State should be had during this Congress I would insist upon having an honest, searching, and fair investigation, and would aid in disclosing corruption and unlawful irregularities if such existed, and that "whitewash" would constitute no component part of any report that would be made to the House thereon. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I was not present at the first meeting of the committee, when the subcommittees were appointed, but I am informed that the gentleman from Michigan was present and acquiesced therein. Subsequently the chairman informed me of my subcommittee appointment, and consequently thereafter I have attended studiously all of the investigations pertaining to the matter contained in this report and took an active part therein, and sought to elicit the truth honestly and fairly by rigid cross-examination from all witnesses who appeared before the committee. Now, the insinuation of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEDEMEYER] is, and I shall so construe it until he says to the contrary, that when I first went on that committee I was "one-minded with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN]," and that I was not actuated by the "sole desire to arrive at the truth in this matter."

I will admit that after hearing the testimony, and all of it, and after thoroughly investigating and considering it for many weeks, I became convinced that there were certain irregularities in the department, and particularly the acts and doings of Mr. Michael and Mr. Morrison, that should at least receive a reprimand, and that this House and the department's attention should be called thereto. Accordingly, Mr. HAMLIN, Mr. DENT, and myself did concur and were "one-minded" in submitting to the other members of the committee our findings of fact and conclusions in the premises, and other members of the committee concurred with us, and approved of the majority report. I will say that I firmly believe that any Member of this House who is a lawyer, had he been present at and examined the witnesses produced before the committee, would have honestly and nonpartisanly come to the same conclusion. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, it has been frequently stated on the floor of the House that we have besmirched the character of ex-Secretary Hay. This I emphatically deny. His connection with this matter was thoroughly discussed, and his thorough exoneration was conceded by all, and language was put into this report completely exonerating him, and the slightest reflection upon his honored name was carefully avoided, for your committee conscientiously believed and still believe that if any irregularity or misappropriation of funds was accomplished by or through the means of a voucher bearing his indorsement he was not a party knowingly cognizant thereof; that he never saw or handled one dollar of the sixteen hundred dollars which the committee concluded had been misappropriated by either Michael or Morrison, or both. [Applause.]

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. If I have time; yes.

Mr. TILSON. Nevertheless, it is a fact that these alleged irregularities occurred under the administration of the late Secretary Hay, and he was responsible for them?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes, sir. I suppose that is technically true, in a sense, but we had before us the present Secretary of State and his predecessor, two as great Secretaries as this Nation ever had, and from them it was gathered that in the multiplicity of business in the course of each day they sign hundreds of papers presented to them for their indorsement, and perforce are bound to trust the officers that the Government provides for the transaction of the details of the department. Again, it is a matter of common knowledge that Cabinet officers usually do and must of necessity rely upon subordinates in carrying out the numberless details of a great department like this, and especially is this true in the furnishing of statement of expenditures. Who else can they rely upon with greater security than their chief clerk, who bears such an intimate relationship to the Cabinet officer?

No, Mr. Speaker; Secretary Hay was not a party to the irregularities which we complain of on the part of Mr. Michael and Mr. Morrison. The committee knows it, and this House knows it. Yet, in defiance of the oft-repeated statement of the members of the committee that such is the case, constantly, certain Members persist that we of the committee are besmirching the character of this worthy man. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I hope I have made it plain that the committee does not hold Secretary Hay responsible, but while on this subject I wish to call the attention of the House to a portion of the letter written by Mr. Charles Denby, formerly the chief clerk of the State Department under Secretary Hay, now consul general to Vienna.

This letter is in response to a cablegram from Secretary Knox informing Mr. Denby of the substance of the facts elicited before the committee pertaining to this $2,400 voucher and asking for an explanation. This letter refers to the investigation made by him under the direction of Secretary ROOT in 1906, which has been so frequently alluded to. Mr. Denby says:

How far the alleged irregularities in the use of the particular funds in question were within the knowledge of Secretary Hay could not be ascertained, as he died in 1905, in which year also Mr. Michael went as consul general to Calcutta. Such practices were not continued under Secretary ROOT, but reports were brought to my knowledge while I was chief clerk that the practice had previously existed. In view of the entire lack of reliable proof of misappropriation of funds, the inevitable unpleasant criticism of the administration of an honored man who had recently died which would result from public action, the incident was passed over and no official action thereon was taken.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, it will be seen that if any intimation was ever made as to the possible knowledge of Secretary Hay concerning these irregularities it emanates from Mr. Denby. Furthermore, Mr. Denby states, in response to telegram from Secretary Knox, as follows:

VIENNA, May 30, 1911—11 a. m.

SECRETARY STATE, Washington:

Telegram 29th received. No written report was made. Careful preliminary investigation failed to convince department that criminal charges could be sustained. My report by next mail.

DENBY.

Here, Mr. Speaker, is an official of the Government, now consul general to Vienna and who made investigations in 1906, while Mr. ROOT was Secretary of State, intimating that criminal charges hovered around this transaction, but from lack of reliable evidence they were not invoked. It is also apparent from the letter of Mr. Denby that the reason why no official action was taken was because of the "inevitable unpleasant criticism" which would result from public action.

The committee in their report in no manner criticizes Mr. Denby's conclusion. As to the thoroughness of this investigation some criticism could justly be made, for it does appear that one at least of the main parties to the transaction was not called upon to explain what he knew concerning it, for Mr. Rosenthal testified that he was not, and never knew that an investigation was being had.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. I know the gentleman means to be fair, and will he not add the other reason which is put first by Mr. Denby, that in view of the entire lack of evidence——

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I read both of those, my friend.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman said the reason was that it would reflect on the administration.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I said that was stated in the letter which followed the telegram. I read the whole thing. Have kept nothing back.

Mr. TILSON. That is the condition to-day. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I think not, because the investigation was not thorough, Mr. Rosenthal was not called upon to explain the transaction, and no other evidence was given as far as the committee was able to ascertain. The main thing relied upon was Mr. Michael's letter from Calcutta, and he says that—

The voucher was to be signed by me and not by Rosenthal. If he signed the voucher instead of a receipt it is through error. There was no such purpose. If the voucher was sent to him to sign it was by inadvertence; and it seems to me unaccountable that he should have signed such a voucher if it had been sent to him.

Mr. Speaker, as the voucher referred to is one of the chief causes of all this difficulty, I desire to read it and have it inserted in the RECORD as part of my remarks. It is as follows:

(Form No. 217.)

The United States to Albert Rosenthal, Dr.

On account of the appropriation for emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service. 1903.

Date. 1903.		Amount. Dollars.	Cents.
Dec. 17.	For expenses incurred and to be paid out of the emergency fund appropriated for 1903	$2,450

(For portrait of Judge Day, late Secretary of State.)

Approved.

JOHN HAY.

Received this 18th day of January, 1904, from Thomas Morrison, Chief Bureau of Accounts, and disbursing clerk, Department of State, the sum of two thousand four hundred and 50/100 dollars, in full payment of the above account.

ALBERT ROSENTHAL.

$2,450.

(Said voucher was indorsed on the back as follows:)

(Form No. 217.)

Appropriation for Emergencies Arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service. 1903.

(Voucher No. 228.)

Paid to Albert Rosenthal for expenses (painting).
Amount, $2,450.
By check on the Treasurer of the United States, No. —.
Dated —.
Paid in cash January 18, 1904. Department of State.

Mr. Speaker, here is a voucher payable to Mr. Rosenthal, yet Morrison pays the whole amount to Mr. Michael. Why is this?

The undisputed facts concerning the origin and history of this voucher as appears from the evidence are, that shortly after Mr. Rosenthal had furnished the picture of ex-Secretary Day to the department this voucher, wholly in blank, was sent by Mr. Michael to Mr. Rosenthal in Philadelphia for his signature. He accordingly signed this blank voucher and transmitted it to Col. Michael. At or about the time of the delivery of the picture, Rosenthal was informed, so he states in his evidence, by Col. Michael that he would probably have to wait a little while for his pay until an appropriation was available out of which this picture could be paid. Mr. Rosenthal states that on or about the 22d of March, 1904, he received a check from Col. Michael for $790 in payment for this picture, $60 having been paid by Col. Michael to the Fischer Art Co., of Washington, D. C., for the frame.

About two years later, in 1906, Mr. Rosenthal visited the State Department concerning the painting of another picture. In the meantime Col. Michael had become consul general to Calcutta, and Mr. Denby, who is now consul general to Vienna, was the chief clerk in the State Department under Mr. ROOT'S administration. Mr. Denby then informed Mr. Rosenthal that owing to the high price that he had charged for Secretary Day's picture he would not be employed further along that line. Mr. Rosenthal informed him that $850 was the total sum he received for the Day picture, including the frame. Thereupon Mr. Denby showed him this voucher for $2,450. The Root investigation, conducted by Mr. Denby, of which so much has been said, then proceeded, which resulted in the making of no written report or any official action being taken thereon, for the reasons stated by Mr. Denby in his letter and telegram. Mr. Morrison, who was the Chief of the Bureau of Accounts and disbursing clerk of the State Department, and who had held this position for many years, informed the committee that on January 16, 1904, Michael orally requested him to obtain $2,450 from the Treasury, without informing him of the purpose for which it was to be used. Mr. Morrison obtained this money through a messenger and placed it in his safe. On the 18th of January, 1904, Morrison took this money to Col. Michael's room and delivered it to him in person, in cash, and was then informed in Mr. Michael's room that it was to pay for the painting of the picture of ex-Secretary Day. The testimony of Morrison concerning the transaction is quite conflicting, but time will not permit a review now. From the evidence it is gathered that an entry was not made on the books of this transaction for nearly two years; that the voucher was never turned over to the Auditor of the Treasury Department, which is charged with the responsibility of auditing Morrison's accounts; that this is the only transaction within the memory of Morrison that he ever drew money from the Treasury upon the oral request of anyone before a voucher was placed in his hands.

In further support of the contention that this money was ordered to be drawn from the Treasury exclusively for the payment of the Day portrait and for no other purpose, I desire to quote from the testimony of Secretary Knox. Mr. Knox, very soon after the committee began investigating the subject, also began an investigation on his own behalf. He states as follows:

I immediately instructed the Assistant Secretary of State to at once institute an investigation. The next day I inquired as to what had been discovered, and he said he had not yet received a report upon it; I then asked for Mr. Carr, and Mr. Carr came to see me. I told him I wanted to know just what the records of the department showed in respect to what Mr. Rosenthal received for the painting of that portrait, and Mr. Carr reported to me that the original entries showed that there had been $2,450 paid for it. I said, "How can it be that a payment of $850 should be charged on the books of the department as having been $2,450?" I said, "I want a thorough investigation of this matter begun at once; I want the records of the department searched for every scrap of information that bears upon the subject, and if we do not get light in that way I want the chief clerk and everybody else who was connected with that transaction or in the service at the time that it occurred who might likely know anything about it questioned upon the subject, no matter where they were."

I want to state right here that the Denby letter and telegram were the result of this investigation. Mr. Knox further informed the committee that this portrait was paid for out of the emergency fund, at least so he was informed by the officers of the department. And your committee respectfully report that this payment out of this fund was wholly unwarranted by law, and constituted a misappropriation. When your committee first began investigating this matter, Mr. Morrison, the proper custodian of this voucher, informed us that it was lost; that in 1906 he delivered it to Mr. Denby, and that he had never seen it since. This statement was made by Mr. Morrison on Monday, May 29, 1911.

On June 13, 1911, Mr. Morrison informed the committee that this voucher had been found—found, as he says, lying on the floor—about 4 to 6 feet from the place he sits in his office, picked up by the janitor or messenger who was there at the time. This singular circumstance is wholly unexplained, and your committee can not wholly exonerate Mr. Morrison in connection with this singular transaction, for he states that he made no inquiry whatever of the employees who had access to his office concerning this mysterious circumstance, except of the janitor who picked it up.

Col. Michael, in his letter of 1906, says that as soon as he received the money from Mr. Morrison he gave it all to Secretary Hay except $850, which he retained for payment of the picture and frame. Bearing in mind that he had previously informed Mr. Rosenthal that he would have to wait for an appropriation available for payment of this picture, yet on January 18, 1911, he received the money from the hand of Morrison, but did not send the money until March 22, 1911, to Rosenthal, nor pay the Fischer Art Co. the $60 for the frame until June, 1911. Upon these statements your committee believes that Mr. Michael is wholly unworthy of belief, and hence doubt his statement to the effect that he ever turned over this money to Secretary Hay; but, on the contrary, the $1,600 was retained by him for his sole benefit or the joint benefit of himself and Morrison.

I have only cited a few instances of the conflicting and inconsistent testimony of Morrison and Michael in connection with this transaction. The testimony, as a whole, reveals much more, some of which has been more fully elucidated by the speech of the chairman yesterday.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question for my information?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want information.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I would like to have a little more time.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five more minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I just want to ask one question.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. No; I can not yield now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman refuses to yield.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Apparently the main circumstance relied upon to shield the parties who are guilty of these alleged irregularities is the statement in Mr. Michael's letter to the effect that he took all of this money—$2,400—and delivered it to Secretary Hay, retaining only $850 wherewith to pay for picture and frame. As I have said before, Mr. Michael's conduct and previous statement to Mr. Rosenthal cast such a doubt upon Mr. Michael's subsequent statement that your committee deem him unworthy of belief.

That while Michael had this money in his possession to pay Mr. Rosenthal, yet he had informed him that he would have to wait a little while until an appropriation was available out of which the picture could be paid.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I can not yield now.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is the precise point I desired to ask about.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. He kept this money from Rosenthal for over two months, and he kept the Fischer Art Co.'s money for five months. A public official who will withhold other people's money in this manner upon plea that they must wait for further available appropriation is not worthy of belief. If he is false in one thing he is false in all. No, Mr. Speaker, our honored Secretary Hay never received or handled one cent of this money. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is unreasonable to suppose that even though Mr. Hay had a right to obtain $2,400 or $24,000 out of this fund that he would obtain it in the manner that the testimony and records disclose, place it in his pocket, his desk, or his safe, and pay it out as the teller of a bank would. It is absurd, unbusinesslike, and contrary to all precedent, and in my judgment would be repugnant to the mind of a man imbued with the lofty ideals and proprieties which we all know that Secretary Hay possessed.

Another matter, Mr. Speaker, is the receipt of Mr. Rosenthal for $790 which is brought into this case. I can not go over the evidence surrounding it, but it is undated; no one knows where it came from; it does not bear the filing or record stamp of the department, and it is the only document which does not bear this stamp; it is false on its face because it states that Mr. Rosenthal received the money on the 18th of January, 1904, while in truth and in fact he did not receive Michael's check until March 22, 1904. Everywhere you turn or examine the evidence of those who ought to know the truth concerning this entire matter you find nothing except inconsistencies, material conflicts, all showing the desire to conceal rather than make plain.

A sentimental objection has arisen upon this floor against the adoption of this report on the ground that it would be a condemnation of Michael without his being heard or having an opportunity to be heard. For many weeks his chief, Secretary Knox, has been advised of the proceedings before the committee, and he informed the committee that he had cabled Mr. Michael advising him thereof and demanding an explanation. That cablegram appears in the record and has been disclosed in the debate upon the floor. That Mr. Knox informed the committee that Mr. Michael knew nothing more or would say nothing more about the transaction than appeared in his letter to Secretary Root in 1906. In view of Mr. Knox's statement, it would have been idle, and we might have been charged with extravagance had we sent for Mr. Michael's return and appearance before the committee. If this report is adopted, which it ought to be, the administration is not bound to act thereon until they further examine Mr. Michael. We have simply presented the facts as we have found them to be. We ask the Congress to adopt them and submit the same to the department and the administration for such action as they deem proper. Our report is not drastic; it is temperate in language and mild in its conclusions. In my judgment, the persistent effort that is being made to impress upon the Members of this House and the country that this report, if adopted, would be a reflection upon the honored name of Secretary Hay is wholly unwarranted, and I emphatically deny that such would be the case; but I am constrained to say that the persistence in such unseemly contention savors of an attempt to shield those who are guilty of irregularities in official life, as set forth in the majority report. No, Mr. Speaker, we do not doubt the honor, integrity, and uprightness of Secretary Hay, but we do doubt that these high purposes can be attributed to either Michael or Morrison. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] to use some of his time.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I desire leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, the conditions under which we take up the discussion of this important matter are humiliating to the membership of this House. I have been a Member of the House for nearly 11 years. During that period I have occupied the time of the House not much in excess of 11 hours; and yet, when I seek an opportunity to express my views upon the subject matter before us, involving, as it does, the guilt or innocence of two Government officials, I am told that I can have but 15 minutes. For years our friends on the other side of the Hall complained that the Committee on Rules as it was then organized was merely an instrumentality for gagging the membership of the House. It is not many months since they joined in a successful effort to reorganize that committee, in order that it might no longer be used for this purpose. And yet to-day, with our friends in absolute control in the House and in the Committee on Rules, instead of giving the Members of the House a reasonable opportunity for the discussion of the important matter before us, they adopt a resolution from the Committee on Rules limiting the debate to an hour and a half on a side.

This action is all the more reprehensible because we sit here to-day not merely in our legislative capacity, but as jurors to try two men who are charged under this resolution with embezzling $1,600 of the Government funds. These two men have served the country in peace and war for many years, and never before has there been a breath of suspicion against either of them. Under these circumstances we should not allow partisan prejudice or the desire for partisan advantage to influence us in the slightest degree. These men are not here to say anything in their own behalf. The fullest opportunity should be given to every Member to discuss the case, and the utmost deliberation should be had before we render our verdict. Mr. Morrison, one of these officials charged with misappropriating Government money, served the country faithfully as a soldier in the Civil War; for 44 continuous years since that period he has served the Government here in Washington. Since the time when he was made disbursing clerk on April 1, 1900, there have passed through his hands more than $6,000,000. In addition to that, he has had charge of the administrative examination for approval and settlement of accounts aggregating more than $18,000,000.

Mr. Michael, the other official charged with embezzling the money of the Government, enlisted in the defense of his country at the age of 16 years. He served faithfully until severely wounded in the Battle of Shiloh. He enlisted in the Navy as soon as his wounds would permit, and served with distinction until the end of the war. He, too, has served the country for years as a faithful and efficient public servant.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] the other day took the time of the House to show how interested the Democratic majority in this House are in the welfare of the old soldier and how anxious that majority have been to enact new pension legislation in behalf of the old soldier. But to-day we have before us a matter affecting two of these old soldiers, a matter that in importance is far above the question of an annual pension. It is a matter that involves not only their official position but their good name and all that in their declining years is most dear to them.

There is another reason why we should approach the subject dispassionately, free from partisan bias, and with an earnest desire to establish the truth. The transaction involved occurred in the Department of State. Mr. Michael is serving his country in a distant foreign land under the Department of State. The Department of State is charged with the administration of our foreign relations. It is of the highest importance that this House should do nothing to reflect unjustly upon one of our representatives abroad, for such discredit necessarily affects the standing of our foreign service. This fact should not deter us from declaring these men guilty if the evidence warrants our doing so; but it is due to ourselves that we should take no action reflecting upon this department of our Government except upon facts fully justifying our course.

I feel all the more justified in saying this because the transaction involved in this resolution occurred years ago under one of our greatest Secretaries of State. He is not here to say the one word which would either exonerate or condemn these men. His present successor, the present distinguished Secretary of State, has reorganized the entire department, has adopted approved business methods, methods which make impossible any such uncertainty as exists respecting the transaction here involved. He has given the country a wise and economical administration, and as the administrator of American diplomacy he should receive our loyal support.

What are the facts respecting this alleged misappropriation of $1,600? In 1904 the Department of State purchased a framed picture of Mr. Day, a former Secretary of State, for the sum of $850. It was paid out of what is known as the emergency fund. Under the statute long in force expenditures from this fund may be made by the Secretary of State upon his own voucher without any explanation as to the purpose for which the money is spent. In this instance, the then Secretary of State, Mr. John Hay, approved a voucher for $2,450. The voucher was delivered to Mr. Michael, then chief clerk, who delivered it to the disbursing officer, Mr. Morrison, who procured the money. It is not denied that $850 was paid in full for the picture and frame. The question is, What became of the remaining $1,600? The only positive evidence upon the subject is the statement of Mr. Michael, who says that when he laid before Secretary Hay the matter of paying for the picture he directed that the voucher be made out for $2,450, as he required $1,600 of that fund, under the statute just referred to; that he took the entire $2,450 to Secretary Hay, who received it, giving him back $850 with which to pay for the picture. The misunderstanding respecting the transaction was caused by one of the clerks of the department in filing this voucher. He understood, apparently, that the entire sum was to go to the artist for the picture, and he put upon the voucher a filing to that effect, and filled out to the same effect the receipt which the artist had signed in blank. Because of this voucher it is insisted that Mr. Michael must have misappropriated the balance of the $2,450.

I insist, in the first place, that Secretary Hay, when he approved the voucher for $2,450, knew perfectly well how much the portrait was to cost. It was he who ordered it. It was he who directed ex-Secretary Day to arrange for it and to arrange for the price. I need not tell you that under these circumstances Secretary Hay was the man to whom Mr. Day reported, and that he reported not only that he had made the arrangement for the picture, but the amount the picture was to cost. Mr. Michael says that after the picture arrived, at the suggestion of the Secretary of State, he wrote to ex-Secretary Day asking him if the picture was satisfactory and what his understanding was as to its cost, and that he handed Mr. Day's reply to Secretary Hay.

The committee reporting this resolution takes occasion to impress upon us that no reflection upon Secretary Hay is intended. I insist that when Secretary Hay approved the voucher for $2,450 he knew perfectly well that the portrait was to cost but $850, and that he added the additional $1,600 because he wished to use it as he was authorized to use it under the statute to which I have already referred.

The committee criticizes the act of Secretary Hay in paying for this picture out of the emergency fund. I shall take no time in discussing whether that is a proper fund out of which to pay for such portrait. I simply say that men like Secretary Hay and Secretary Olney, men of unquestioned integrity, men with the keenest sense of official duty, paid for portraits of former Secretaries out of that fund.

Mr. DENT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Yes; for a question.

Mr. DENT. What portraits did Secretary Olney pay for out of the secret fund?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. He paid for one portrait out of that fund. If the gentleman denies it I can bring the proofs. There is no question about it. He paid for the portrait of former Secretary Gresham.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I will yield for a question.

Mr. COOPER. I observe in the minority report, and also in the majority report, that there was a contract made in 1903 for the painting of a portrait, and that the portrait and frame was to be $850. If the portrait was completed and the voucher sent to Mr. Rosenthal, he to have included that amount, why was it sent in blank?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I am coming to that point in just a moment. This, then, is the first proposition: That Secretary Hay knew that the portrait and frame were to cost $850. All the direct evidence before us plainly indicates this, all the circumstantial evidence before us enforces this fact, and there is not an iota of evidence tending to show the contrary. Such being the fact, it necessarily follows that Secretary Hay did not approve the voucher for $2,450 and hand that sum over to Mr. Michael for the sole purpose of paying for the portrait. We are forced to the conclusion that Mr. Michael has stated the exact truth respecting the transaction—that the additional $1,600 was added to the voucher because Secretary Hay desired that sum to use, as he was authorized to use it under the statute, without filing any statement as to the nature of the expenditure.

But the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] and others are disturbed because Mr. Michael, before paying the artist for the portrait, sent a blank receipt for him to sign and return. This, they say, is an exceedingly suspicious circumstance. And yet these gentlemen and the other Members of the House sign receipts in blank for their salary months before it is received. This practice obtains quite generally in the departments of our Government. I have not doubt that if an examination were had it would be found that the majority of the States pay out no money until receipts signed in blank have been received. I confess it has always seemed to be a very unsatisfactory business method, and I am glad to say that the practice is not in vogue in the Department of State at the present time, and has not been during the present administration. But before condemning Mr. Michael for taking this course it seems to me that these gentlemen should cease signing blank receipts for their own salary.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I dislike exceedingly to appear discourteous. I would be glad to yield. I would be glad to discuss this subject in a deliberative manner, but I am granted only 15 minutes, and under the circumstances I must decline to yield.

So Mr. Michael took a printed form, such as I hold in my hand. As you will see, it is much like an ordinary billhead on which there is a blank for the approval of the Secretary, and beneath which is the blank receipt to be signed by the party receiving the money. Mr. Michael sent this blank voucher and receipt to the artist, Mr. Rosenthal, for his signature to the receipt. This very circumstance makes it plain that Mr. Michael intended at the time to have the voucher executed for the exact amount for which the voucher was to be drawn. If he had intended otherwise, he would not have sent the voucher to Mr. Rosenthal for his signature to the receipt. The voucher would have been made out in his own name. It would have been approved by the Secretary of State, and Mr. Michael would then have signed the receipt at the bottom. Upon the return of this voucher with the receipt signed in blank by the artist, Mr. Michael went to the Secretary of State for the necessary approval. He states that on that occasion the Secretary of State, after looking at the memorandum, directed him to add $1,600 to the amount proposed, as he desired that amount in cash. Mr. Michael, for his own protection, should have thereupon discarded the voucher which the artist had signed in blank. He should have used a new voucher. But he did not do so. He filled out for John Hay to sign in approval the voucher for $2,450 on this blank which the artist had signed. The Secretary of State approved the voucher. The money was drawn, and $850 was used to pay for this portrait and the balance was delivered to Mr. Hay.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I can not yield to the gentleman from Missouri. He has seen fit to so limit this debate that I am allowed but 15 minutes in which to express my views upon this very important matter. I desire to complete my statement. If the gentleman will secure me more time, I shall be very glad to yield to him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I desire to place my statement before the House, and then I shall be glad to yield, if my time has not expired. I feel it my duty to place on record my judgment as to the evidence before us upon which, under our oath of office, we must make decision.

In the next place, I call your attention to the fact, which seems to me conclusive, of the innocence of Mr. Morrison and Mr. Michael; that when Mr. Michael sent the artist a check for $790 he inclosed a receipt for that amount, which the artist says he signed at that time, adding below the receipt in his own handwriting a memorandum to the effect that this sum did not include the $60 which was the price agreed upon for the frame. Did you ever hear of a man who was planning to steal $1,600 placing in the public files the very evidence that would convict him of the crime? Yet this is what the evidence shows Mr. Michael did. And this investigation would never have been instigated but for the fact, as the evidence shows, that a clerk in the department, to whom was handed the original voucher, approved by Secretary Hay, with the blank receipt signed by the artist, assuming that the entire $2,450 was to be paid for the picture, filled out the blank receipt for $2,450, thereby making it appear that the artist had received that amount from the Government for the picture. This document was then filed; but in due time when the $790 had been paid to the artist the receipt mentioned above, signed by the artist, was filed with the original voucher, showing just what portion of the $2,450 went for the picture and the frame.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that under these circumstances, and with these facts before them, no jury would be justified in finding that Mr. Michael stole the $1,600. We should not do, we should not ask our colleagues to do, that which we would ask no jury to do. If I could say that the case presented even reasonable ground for believing that Mr. Morrison and Mr. Michael are guilty as alleged, I should vote for the resolution.

But I insist that there is no evidence before us tending to show that these men who heretofore, through a long period of years, have been looked upon as honest and faithful and trustworthy public officials, turned thieves and plunderers and embezzlers all at once by converting to their own use this sum of $1,600.

There is one other thing. In the course of his statement before the committee the Secretary of State stated that he had inaugurated an investigation of his own. That investigation has been going on and is still going on. As I have said before, this is an all-important matter. The reputations of these men are at stake. The hearings before the committee were ex parte. Mr. Morrison was called before it, but he had no man to appear in his behalf. Every man charged with a crime is entitled to have counsel. Mr. Michael is thousands of miles away. I respectfully submit, in view of the fact that Secretary Knox is investigating the case, in view of the fact that he has shown an earnest desire to establish the exact truth, in view of the fact that this committee has not yet completed its work, that in all fairness this matter should go over until next December. No possible harm can come to anyone because of this short delay. It will enable the department to secure the presence of Mr. Michael. Such a delay will indicate to the country a determination on the part of the majority to deal fairly with these men, a determination to give them a fair opportunity to vindicate their good name. In short, such a moderate delay will aid in establishing the truth, which should be our highest purpose in this important matter.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we are trying a man here to see if he is a thief and I think the jury ought to be present. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-nine Members present—not a quorum.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and fifty-eight Members present—a quorum.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will reopen the doors, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, it is a fundamental rule of justice and of law dating back at least as far as the Garden of Eden that the accused shall have notice and opportunity to be heard in his own defense. When our first parents had donned their fig leaf costumes and were hidden amongst the trees of the garden and the evidence against them was overwhelming, they were not condemned without a hearing, but there went forth to Adam from the great Judge and Ruler of the Universe the verbal summons, "Where art thou?" Thereupon they came forth and put in such defense as they could. Then, and then only, was the decree in ejectment entered against them.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. OLMSTED. I can not yield in the limited time of five minutes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I want to ask if it is not——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania declines to yield.

Mr. OLMSTED. From that date until the present moment of time, Mr. Speaker, it has been considered contrary to the first great, eternal, everlasting principles of justice that any person, great or small, shall be condemned unheard. That doctrine is embedded in our Constitution. It has been declared by our courts over and over and over again. No verdict can stand against the veriest felon and upon the strongest proof, unless he be in court during the trial. No citizen can be compelled to pay even the smallest tax until he has had an opportunity to be heard, to question the fairness of the assessment. But it is proposed by the adoption of this resolution to condemn a public official thousands of miles from home, attending to his official duties in a distant land beyond the sea, who has had no hearing and has not even been communicated with by the committee or any member thereof. He does not know, perhaps, that charges have been made against him.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN], the chairman of the committee, argues that Mr. Michael should be considered as having been heard because the committee has seen his letter to Secretary ROOT, written in 1906, fully accounting for the $1,600 in question and showing the money to have been in the hands of Secretary Hay. Secretary ROOT was satisfied with that letter, but a majority of the committee say they do not believe its contents to be true. They tell us that the committee has other evidence, from which it concludes or draws the inference that Michael or Morrison misappropriated the money. The evidence which they cite falls far short of justifying any such inference. But has Michael seen that evidence? No. Has he had an opportunity to explain it? No. Has he been heard at all? No. And yet we are asked by the adoption of this resolution to condemn, degrade, and disgrace him, and if possible deprive him of his office as well as his good reputation, dearer to him than life itself. What is the occasion for this? The Constitution makes specific provision for the impeachment of any civil official of the United States for an offense such as is here rather insinuated than charged. A motion to impeach is privileged. Any Member may rise in his place at any time and make it. Then, should the motion prevail, the accused would have an opportunity to appear, know the specific charge against him, face his accusers, examine and cross-examine witnesses, and make his defense. Why is not the constitutional method pursued? Perhaps the answer is found in the last paragraph of the committee's report, which reads:

> In conclusion, in view of the statute of limitations and the difficulty of proof resulting from death and the lapse of time, your committee deem it unnecessary to make any suggestions or recommendations relative to criminal prosecution of either Michael or Morrison.

Nobody concerned has died since the investigation began. There is not now and never has been any statute of limitations to bar impeachment proceedings. So it must be because of the "difficulty of proof" that we are asked to condemn, without proof as well as without a hearing, these high officials, these gentlemen of hitherto unsullied reputations, these two Grand Army veterans. I have too much confidence in the membership of this body to assume that enough votes can be secured to perpetrate so great an injustice, so gross an outrage. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to participate in this debate, but there is one phase of this question which I think ought to be presented to the House, which I do not believe has been, though it may have been touched upon. As has been said by a number of those who have spoken, this is not an ordinary legislative matter that comes before the House for consideration, in which we are asked to sustain or vote down the committee. We are here upon this question as a jury, and are asked to vote a verdict of guilty of criminal conduct concerning two men, citizens of the United States, and the President of the United States is asked to impose sentence upon them by dismissal.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what I desire to bring before the House is this: That so far this is a proceeding analogous to an ordinary criminal case. But no further than that, for in a trial before a jury the testimony is first produced before that jury, and then counsel sum up their arguments and the jury renders its verdict.

Now, Mr. Speaker, here are 170 pages of testimony concerning this question taken by the committee. I want to ask how many Members of this House outside of the members of this committee have read that testimony? And I assert that no Member who has not read that testimony from the beginning to the end, no matter what his opinion may be as an individual, can in good conscience vote for that resolution without first having read the testimony. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Why, Mr. Speaker, what would be thought of a criminal case where a jury rendered a verdict solely upon the argument of counsel absent when the testimony was taken, and not only absent, but who have not read the testimony? Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against this resolution, not because I believe the majority are wrong—as an individual I think, perhaps, they are right—but I have no right as a Member of this House to vote a verdict of guilty here without having read this testimony. And

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I have read about half of this. I think I am as diligent as the ordinary, average Member of this House, but I venture to assert that there are not one-third of the Members of this House to-day outside of the members of this committee who have read this testimony.

And, Mr. Speaker, if opportunity offers later on I shall offer an amendment to this resolution striking out the words "concurred in and adopted," and substituting for them the words:

That this report and the testimony taken in connection therewith be transmitted to the President of the United States for such action as he may deem proper in the premises.

And that is as far as I think this House should go. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman used all his time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin has consumed four minutes and one-half.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] is recognized for one minute.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I know it can be truthfully said of me that I am a partisan, but I hope it can be said of me with equal truthfulness that I desire at all times to see justice done. I do not know these men, neither am I aware of all their public service. I must go to the evidence to convict them, and I am not satisfied that the evidence is sufficient.

In this one minute I propose to suggest to the House that we postpone a conclusion upon this resolution until they can be summoned and heard, and unless they can answer to our satisfaction I will vote to condemn them. Unless Mr. Michael can explain why he kept public money longer than he should have kept it, I am ready to vote to convict him according to the indictment. I suggest to the House that we ought not to be hasty, but should suspend judgment until the trial is completed in order that entire justice can be done. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, I became a little curious when I read the report of this subcommittee to know the professions or the callings which the gentlemen composing it follow in their daily lives outside the Hall of Congress. Not a little to my surprise I found in the Congressional Directory that all three of them are lawyers by profession. There are many lawyers upon this floor, and I think that nearly all of them will agree with me in the statement that if these gentlemen were trying this kind of a case before a jury, and even if they were on the side of the State for the prosecution, without a single exception every one of the three would be compelled to say, "We have got to have better evidence than this before we will even prefer an indictment before an ex parte grand jury, let alone trying them before a petit jury, to convict them upon evidence beyond a reasonable doubt." [Applause on the Republican side.]

It was said by my friend from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN], chairman of the committee, for whom I have the very highest regard, in his speech of yesterday:

We are not asking you to brand these men as criminals. As I said before, I believe that old man Morrison is an honest man.

I will say to you, gentlemen, that if this resolution does pass, it will have the effect before the community in which they have lived all their lives, and before the people of the United States, of branding them as criminals beyond all doubt, and that, too, by the highest tribunal in the land, in a legislative sense, at least.

I am glad that this investigation has partaken of a nonpartisan character to a certain extent. I am glad that one of these three gentlemen of the subcommittee sits on the other side of the House. I am more than pleased to believe that no inconsiderable number of my associates on this side of this House will vote against the adoption of this resolution. I wish very much that it could be defeated, for I am unwilling, from the knowledge I have of this testimony—and I have read considerable of it—and especially from the arguments that have been made here on both sides of the question, to vote to convict these two men.

I asked a colleague on this side of this House who intends, I believe, to vote in favor of the resolution if he would kindly read the letter sent by Mr. Michael replying to Secretary ROOT and then to indicate, by a word or a line, in what manner he would change it in order to make it consistent with a statement that would come from an innocent man, and he was unable to suggest any change. I can not find anything, gentlemen, in the statement of Mr. Michael that is unreasonable or inconsistent with the truth. I can not find anything that has been contradicted here. We as lawyers and business men—men accustomed to studying human nature—rely a great deal upon the advantage which we have if we can see a man face to face and look into his eyes. Then we discern what kind of a man he is, whether he is truthful or not; and I have oftentimes said to myself, "I wish I could see face to face the man who wrote that letter; I wish I could look into his eyes"; because if I did that I could form a better judgment of the man than by merely reading his cold statement.

But here is a man who is on the other side of the earth. We have not had the opportunity to see him, to study his manners, or to cross-examine him. I know a cablegram was sent to Secretary Knox by Michael in reply to a request for information as to the disposition of the remainder of the voucher, and his reply in itself is strong corroboration to me of the fact that the man is telling the truth. I appeal to you, who know the nature of men who are untruthful, that they, as a rule, try to hedge, to qualify, to modify, or enlarge some previous statements when suspicion is directed toward them. But all Michael says is, in substance, just the same as you and I would say, desiring to tell the truth: "Why, I can not add a word to what I have already said. I told the truth."

In conclusion, I desire to say very briefly, because my time will not permit——

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. SHARP. I can not yield, because I have only two minutes left.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. SHARP. Not only as lawyers, but as men of practical affairs, we naturally seek to know the motive governing any particular actions or conduct which are to be scrutinized or investigated, as well as to ascertain the reasons for issuing certain statements. I want to ask you in all candor, my colleagues, what motive Secretary ROOT would have in dismissing these charges as ill founded after examining into them, as the testimony shows he did, especially if coupled with an intimation that one of the greatest statesmen of the times, his predecessor and friend, Mr. Hay, whom both these reports and all the evidence absolve from any blame, unless the charges were, in fact, without foundation. [Applause.]

I would be pleased to vote for the resolution if the findings of the committee were limited to a censure of the unbusinesslike methods which characterized this particular transaction under investigation, and which would include a recommendation to reform such methods. To the extent that the laxness and reprehensible manner of doing business in the department under investigation has been revealed, I believe the work of the committee has been of distinct value. But that the evidence shows, with any degree of certainty, criminality upon the part of those under investigation I can not believe. Indeed, can I give a better reason for declining to vote for a resolution that will put the stain of crime upon those men than by quoting the last paragraph of the majority report of the committee, which reads as follows:

In conclusion, in view of the statutes of limitation and the difficulty of proof resulting from death and lapse of time, your committee deem it unnecessary to make any suggestion or recommendation relative to criminal prosecution of either Michael or Morrison.

If, gentlemen, this committee is unwilling to make any such recommendation because of "death and lapse of time"—both important elements entering into this case—I am certainly justified in refusing to vote, for the same reasons, in favor of recommending their dismissal from office, which, in view of these accusations, is tantamount to declaring to the world their guilt.

Mr. TILSON. I yield four and one-half minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, no man on the floor of this House has more respect for the majority members of this subcommittee than myself, and I do not believe that any Member here would intentionally do an injustice to any man in order to secure a political advantage. I want to appeal on behalf of these men, one of whom has not been given an opportunity either to appear before this committee in person or to be represented by an attorney.

Both of these men served in the Union Army. Both of them have long and honorable official careers in various departments of our Government. Both of them are men of family. Let me read a brief summary of the careers of these men:

MR. MICHAEL.

Mustered into United States Volunteer Infantry service September 21, 1861.

Honorably discharged on account of injuries sustained in battle of Shiloh October 23, 1862.

Reentered service in 1863 as master's mate in Navy.
Was promoted in 1864 for gallant conduct in action.
Honorably discharged, with thanks of the Government, in June, 1866.
Was connected in the Capitol as editor and compiler of Congressional Directory.
Stayed there until May 20, 1897, when he was appointed Chief Clerk of State Department.
Appointed consul general to Calcutta November 16, 1905.
Born in 1845, which would make him now 66 years of age.

MR. MORRISON.

Immediate family consists of his wife and four children.
Born in 1843, which would make him now 68 years of age.
Was a soldier for four years. Served all through Civil War in the Army of the Potomac.
Entered the service of the State Department in 1867.
Was employed in various capacities in State Department until April 1, 1900, when he was appointed Chief of Bureau of Accounts.
From April 1, 1900, to June 30, 1903, he disbursed $1,600,000.
During fiscal year of 1904, which was year the portrait was purchased, he disbursed $419,000.
From 1904 to 1911 he disbursed $4,140,000.
Total amount disbursed from appointment, April 1, 1900, to June 30, 1911, $6,159,000.
In addition, has had charge of examination of accounts amounting to $18,000,000.
Has had charge of the trust funds of department, amounting to $6,450,000.

Are you going to destroy the character of these two old honorably discharged soldiers with records of faithful and efficient public service in the departments of this Government on such testimony as this? Would it not be fairer to recommit this resolution to the committee, and give these men, especially Mr. Michael, an opportunity to be confronted with these charges, and to permit the members of this committee to look into his eyes and cross-examine him and watch his demeanor on the stand under oath?

In the trial of our worst criminals they are entitled to the benefit of a doubt. Are you going to say that these men committed the larceny of $1,600 after half a century of faithful service and after handling millions of dollars of the public funds? Is it right, is it just, is it fair? I submit this question to the honor and the conscience of every man in this House. If you were sitting as a judge on the bench, with this testimony before you, you would not for a moment destroy the character of a fellow citizen—an old soldier—and our responsibility here as Members of this House under our oath ought to appeal to each and every one of us to weigh this testimony as though we were trying the men in a court of justice. [Applause.]

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, in the limited time at my disposal I will only have time to go into one feature of this case. Before I do that, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I enter upon the discussion of the question without desiring to cast any reflection upon any man or to impugn the motive of any man. I want also to say that this investigation developed some things that seem to me ought to be remedied. I do not believe that the Secretary of State ought to be permitted, out of this particular secret emergency fund, to buy portraits of ex-Secretaries or to use the money in that way. I am not satisfied with the explanation, or any of it, that has been given in regard to the finding of this voucher, and had the committee brought in some recommendation along the lines where evil has been disclosed I would only be too glad to support it.

But I want to speak, in the few moments that are given me, of the only man who has never had a hearing. Men speak of a reasonable doubt, and all that. Why, gentlemen, here is a case where you are going to condemn a man who has not been tried. Mr. Michael is on the other side of the world and to-day is ignorant, I presume, that any charge of dishonesty of any kind has been lodged against him. He has had no opportunity to meet these charges.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I can not yield; I have only five minutes. Will the gentleman yield me more time? If so, I will yield to him.

Mr. HAMLIN. No; go ahead.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to discuss it entirely on the theory of the gentleman from Missouri, the chairman of the committee. For the sake of argument, I want to assume that everything has been proven which he says has been proven. What do we have? My friend from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] says that the evidence discloses that this man Michael carried $850 around in his pocket for a month. Has Michael had an opportunity to deny it? Has he had an opportunity to explain it? Does he know that that kind of a charge has been lodged against him? It is said that he did other things; and yet every one of the charges, without any exception, from the very admission of the gentleman from Missouri, has been made in Michael's absence, without his knowledge and without an opportunity to be confronted with the witnesses or to present any evidence of any witness in his behalf. It seems to me that we are not giving fair play and justice to a fellow man, and it ought to cause us to hesitate before we condemn a man without a hearing, without a trial, upon evidence that has been offered in his absence, without his knowledge, and without giving him any opportunity to refute it.

Every man here who has been engaged in the trial of lawsuits, whether as an attorney or judge, knows that a case is often made that looks on the face of it as if it could not be disproved; and yet when the other side is heard the case is completely revolutionized and reversed.

Even if it is true that you believe that Michael had stolen the money out of the Treasury, yet you ought to give him at least the opportunity that you give the common criminal to be heard in his own defense. You have said that you do not accuse Secretary Hay. I am glad of that; I am glad to know that no one accuses him. You say it is wrong to bring any aspersions on his name because he is dead. Gentlemen, as far as this case is concerned, Michael is likewise dead. He has not had any more opportunity to be heard than Secretary Hay had. The letter of Mr. Michael is in the RECORD, and any man who will read it will admit that if that letter be true, then he has a good defense. Remember that letter was written before any evidence was taken by the committee. If it has been disproved, or any evidence tending to disprove it has been offered, then he should be allowed to offer any evidence he may have in explanation before we render judgment. He does not even know that any such evidence has been offered or that anyone has even disputed his letter. [Applause.]

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this resolution proposes that two officers of the Government should be discharged on the ground that they are thieves, on the specification that they stole a particular sum of money. No other justification can be given for asking for the discharge of these two men, except that they are sneak thieves, that they filched $1,600, not only by stealing it, but, under false pretenses, by overcoming the care of the Secretary of State and imposing upon him. Not only that they stole the money, but that they did it in a mean way.

Here is a voucher marked "approved" by the Secretary of State. While the majority of the committee say that they cast no reflections on the Secretary of State, one of two things is inevitable: Either that the Secretary of State improperly approved a voucher in blank without knowing what it was, or else the Secretary of State himself took the money and improperly or properly used it.

It is easy to say there is no reflection cast upon the Secretary of State. It is inevitable that if these men were thieves the Secretary of State approved a voucher improperly, approved a voucher to be paid out of the secret fund, when it was the special duty of the Secretary of State to guard the secret fund—not an ordinary voucher payable out of an ordinary account, but a voucher payable out of a secret fund that it has always been the duty of the Secretary of State to carefully watch in approving vouchers. In this case, if the Secretary of State marked this voucher "approved" without knowing what it was, then he was guilty of gross negligence. If he knew what it was, the gentlemen say they have no further complaint, that they do not believe that he stole the money. No one would dare say that John Hay stole the money.

Now, the proposition is that the other men stole the money—stole it—not a mistake that was made, but that there was thievery. There is a method of reaching thievery. Here is a man who is consul general of the United States at Calcutta, who was formerly chief clerk in the State Department, a civil officer of the Government, specifically named in the Constitution, so far as the consuls are concerned, for appointment by the President of the United States. There is a method of reaching him, not barred by the statute of limitations at all. The President of the United States nominates and, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," appoints consuls of the United States.

The President, the Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

This House in the past has acted in similar cases. It is within the power of this House under the Constitution to present articles of impeachment against this consul general of the United States for misdemeanors or crimes committed by him while he was the chief clerk in the State Department. If you have evidence against him, let the case be tried in the Senate of the United States. By what right do you propose to try and condemn a man here in a case that is provided for by the Constitution for trial elsewhere? Under the Constitution we have our functions to perform. If we believe that Michael is a thief, that he stole $1,600 from the State Department, it is our duty on our sworn oaths to present articles of impeachment for trial before the greatest trial tribunal of the country, the Senate of the United States.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. For a short question.

Mr. LEWIS. Have we the power to present articles of impeachment and the Senate the power to try them after a man has left the office in which the alleged delinquencies occurred?

Mr. MANN. In the Forty-fifth Congress, which was a Democratic House, there were two resolutions of impeachment brought into the House against two different officials for what was claimed to be crimes committed by them in offices which they held prior to their appointment to the offices which they then held—exactly a parallel case—and while those matters were not disposed of by the House——

Mr. LEWIS. Exactly. The Senate did not determine that it had jurisdiction. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. I did not yield to the gentleman for an argument. I have only five minutes. Gentlemen on that side of the House applaud. Mr. Speaker, there are a lot of men over there who would applaud nothing, and that is what they do [laughter and applause on the Democratic side]—and still keep at it. In that case the Democratic committee of the House reported it had jurisdiction and that Congress had jurisdiction. If you want to determine whether this man can be convicted, try him in the proper tribunal. That is where we have a right to try him. We can present articles of impeachment if he is guilty of a crime.

It is easy to say that this man may have made a mistake somewhere. I do not know whether a mistake was made in reference to this voucher in some way or not. Here we have this one little thing coming before the House now. There have been three mistakes made by the officers of this House in reference to this one thing already, and I do not propose to criticize the officers of the House for that. It is so easy at times to make mistakes. The other day the gentleman from Alabama is reported in the RECORD to have introduced bill H. R. 12617, approving Report No. 59 of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department. I do not know whether the gentleman from Alabama introduced such a bill or not, but you can not get it from the document room. You can not find out where it has ever been printed. You can send out, any of you, for House bill 12617, and you will not get it. Now, that was a mistake by somebody. I am not criticizing the mistake. The other day a resolution was reported into the House, now before the House, and that was not reprinted. That was mistake No. 2.

Mr. MADISON rose.

Mr. MANN. Just a moment. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] reported in the resolution for the consideration of this measure, and what was done with it? It was taken up and considered at the time and passed by the House, and yet some gentleman connected with the administration of the House ordered printed that resolution with this statement, "which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed."

It was neither referred to the House Calendar nor was it ordered to be printed. That is mistake No. 3. If, in the consideration of one thing in the House the employees of the House, new though they be and probably excusable, make three mistakes, by what authority do we propose to condemn as a thief a man or men who have made a mistake, for aught I know complying strictly with the law, a number of years ago? Which one of these is the thief, Michael or Morrison? Are both of them thieves? Which one stole the money? Is anyone here prepared to say that if the money was stolen which one of them stole the money? And yet you propose to punish both of them as thieves. Will anyone here, does the majority of the committee, undertake to say, if the money was stolen, whether Michael or Morrison stole it? And yet you propose to say they are both thieves. [Applause on the Republican side.] Is it possible——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. I regret, Mr. Speaker, owing to lack of time, that we propose to condemn a man as a thief without a full hearing.

Mr. JAMES. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL].

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time that the application of the secret-service fund has been investigated by the House of Representatives. When the Department of State was under the control of as great a Secretary as any nation ever had there was a charge that there had been a misuse of the secret-service fund, and an investigation was had by the House, controlled by the political party opposed to the administration, a House in which the majority was Democratic. A fair hearing was given, and it is one of the dramatic incidents of history that the vindication of Daniel Webster, the greatest champion of the Union, bore upon it the name of Jefferson Davis, who was afterwards the President of the Southern Confederacy. [Applause.] Now, I would commend to gentlemen upon the other side to imitate that distinguished example. The record in war of one of these men has been alluded to. That gives him no immunity to commit a crime; but I know of no nation so barbarous, no government—be it an empire or a republic—where the fact that a citizen has shed his blood in its defense upon the field of battle does not justify him in claiming a fair hearing. [Applause on the Republican side.] Michael has not been heard. This voucher bears the name of John Hay, who was not a weakling, and a strong presumption must go with that. Then, when the incident was still fresh an investigation was held by the then Secretary of State, ELIHU ROOT, a great lawyer, and he found that there was nothing in these charges. I submit to this Democratic House of Representatives to-day it will be little to its credit under those circumstances to brand as guilty this man, who has had no opportunity whatever to be heard. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire how much time is left to this side?

The SPEAKER. Eight and a half minutes.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, in view of the very short time which is left to me, and not wishing to be discourteous to any Member, I ask, Mr. Speaker, that I may not be interrupted during the few minutes that I shall occupy the floor.

Disguise it as we may, we can not conceal or get away from the fact that this is not an ordinary legislative proceeding in this House. It is analogous to or partakes of many of the elements of a criminal trial. It is a jury trial in which we as Members of this House are the jurors. The accused in this case are Michael and Morrison, two men advanced in years, both of them men who have served their country in both civil and military life, both men of good reputation, and men who are entitled to be fairly heard. The charge is embezzlement. That is all there is to it; you can not get away from it. It is a charge of embezzlement, and if this resolution is passed, so far as this House—the greatest legislative body in the world—can brand a man, these two men are branded as embezzlers. This resolution asks the President of the United States to remove these two men from office. For what?

For the misappropriation of funds, for the stealing of $1,600. That is what it comes down to and that will be the verdict of this jury in case this resolution should pass in its present form. We can not get away from that, and at the risk of repetition I desire to state another thing we can not get away from, and that is the fact that we are condemning one of these men unheard. We are told that we have a letter of Col. Michael here and that he has cabled from Calcutta that he can not add to it, therefore he has been heard. What would you say of such reasoning and deductions as that in a criminal trial?

A number of references are made to Michael in the testimony of witnesses called by the subcommittee. The artist, Mr. Rosenthal, refers to him in a number of cases, and especially in regard to the time he received the money for the portrait. If anyone wishes to see an example of evidence that is vague and indefinite, I call your attention to the testimony which Mr. Rosenthal gave as to the time in which he delivered this picture and as to the time that he received his pay. Here is a sample from the hearings:

The CHAIRMAN. Are you prepared to state about the date you received your pay for the Day portrait?

Mr. ROSENTHAL. Well, the only recollection I have is what the Real Estate Trust Co. informed me, that my deposit slip was March 22, 1904, as I believe I wrote you—an item of $790 by a check from Washington; that is the only recollection I have of any check from Washington about that time, and it must have covered that portrait.

The CHAIRMAN. That was on March 22, 1904?

Mr. ROSENTHAL. That was the time I made the deposit.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what is your judgment about the time you received that check?

Mr. ROSENTHAL. It must have been about that time. As to the date of the picture, I do not recall when I delivered that. Of course, it is a long time ago, and all I do recall is that at the time the picture was delivered I probably had to wait a little while until an appropriation was available out of which this picture could be paid; some such statement was made, I recall.

The CHAIRMAN. Who made a statement like that to you?

Mr. ROSENTHAL. The chief clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you receive pay for the picture at about the time you signed the voucher?

Mr. ROSENTHAL. That I do not recall; I do not recall when I signed the voucher or the date of it.

The CHAIRMAN. I am not speaking about the date of it, but the circumstance——

Mr. ROSENTHAL (interposing). I think there must have been some time elapsing, because this explanation would not have been given if I had gotten my check at once.

The CHAIRMAN. You undoubtedly did not get the check at the time you signed the voucher?

Mr. ROSENTHAL. It could not have been possible.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you remember the date that voucher bears?

Mr. ROSENTHAL. I have not the slightest idea.

The CHAIRMAN. The record shows is bears the date of January 18, 1904.

Mr. ROSENTHAL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not get your money on that date?

Mr. ROSENTHAL. I could not have possibly gotten it then.

The CHAIRMAN. I hand witness paper now marked Exhibit No. 2, and I will ask you if you have ever seen that paper before?

Mr. ROSENTHAL. It looks like my writing; that is my writing; that is the way I usually put on a postscript.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you have any recollection as to the time you signed that paper?

Mr. ROSENTHAL. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Perhaps I had better read it into the record. I will ask you whether you have any recollection of signing, or did you sign, a paper which reads as follows:

"Received on the 18th day of January, 1904, the sum of $790 for a portrait of Judge Day, late Secretary of State, for the Department of State. Albert Rosenthal."

Mr. ROSENTHAL. That is evidently signed by me and that is my writing underneath.

The CHAIRMAN. The writing underneath referred to by the witness is as follows:

"This does not include the frame, for which Mr. Fischer received directly from the department $60. A. R."

Do you remember the date?

Mr. ROSENTHAL. No; I have not the slightest idea.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any recollection of the circumstance of signing this paper at all?

Mr. ROSENTHAL. No recollection at all, except that I only felt there must be some such receipt in the hands of somebody.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you not have any recollection whatever whether you signed this in Washington, in Philadelphia, or elsewhere?

Mr. ROSENTHAL. I have not the slightest recollection of where I signed that; I should judge that I must have shipped that from Philadelphia. I would not be surprised if that might have been sent back with the voucher.

The CHAIRMAN. Sent back with the voucher?

Mr. ROSENTHAL. I do not know that.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you have signed that kind of a paper before you received your money?

Mr. ROSENTHAL. Very unlikely.

The CHAIRMAN. It is very unlikely you would have done it?

Mr. ROSENTHAL. Very unlikely.

This is the evidence by which the subcommittee seeks to establish two very important points: First, that Michael wrongfully retained the sum of $790 for two months; and second, that, although he had the money in his possession, he lied to Rosenthal about waiting till an appropriation was available. Can any fair-minded person determine from the hearings just when it was that Rosenthal delivered the portrait or received his pay for it, or when it was Michael made the statement as to the appropriation? The hearings leave all these questions in a fog, and yet they are the chief points upon which the majority of the committee have relied to convict Michael of falsehood and embezzlement. Should he not be confronted with this evidence and given an opportunity to explain before we pronounce judgment? There is testimony to the effect that sums of money were often kept on hand to pay small bills. Michael might easily explain the entire transaction to the satisfaction of all. Why should we condemn him without giving him an opportunity to do so?

This is not a party question. It is not a question of party policy. I am glad that it is not, and it would be passing strange if this broad aisle that separates the two sides of this House should also be found to separate us in our judgment upon questions of law and evidence when presented to us for our consideration. I am glad to be informed by many on that side of the House that it is not so to divide us to-day. I do not blame the members of any party for acting together on matters of party policy. They must do so if they expect to accomplish results. This, however, is not a case of party policy. It is a case of trying these two men and branding them in the eyes of the world as guilty of embezzlement.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I do not know either of these men, and I know nothing of their politics or their religion. They may be Republicans, Democrats, Socialists, or Prohibitionists. They may be Christians, Jews, Mohammedans, or Buddhists. I care not. They are both my fellow men and American citizens, and as such deserve fair treatment. I hold no brief for them and would not defend them here if there were substantial evidence against them; but I submit that if you will read the more than 200 pages of the evidence in this case, and then can bring your consciences to support a resolution to ask for the removal of these men, I shall be satisfied. On yesterday the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] made a touching appeal to party loyalty, not to turn down the committee. My appeal is not to party or party loyalty, but to your sober judgment and your sense of fair play. Is this resolution fair to these two men on the evidence before us?

It has always been my principle to build up rather than to tear down, to help lift up my fellow man rather than try to pull him down, and yet if there is any purpose to this resolution other than partisan purpose—and I am not going to charge that—it is to blacken the reputation of two officials who are living and the memory of one who is dead.

Those of us who are lawyers know that in the construction of evidence we are not to assume that any man tells a lie, and we should assume that every man tells the truth unless there is other and better evidence that necessarily conflicts. In this case we have the letter of Michael, and I would ask the attention of every Member of this House to that letter, which is in the hearings and also in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this morning, and if you find anything in that letter necessarily inconsistent with any other evidence in the hearings or with the innocence of Michael, then I can make no further plea to you.

You will bear in mind that the $2,450 was drawn out of the Treasury, according to the testimony of Michael, which is not disputed, upon a voucher made up after consultation with Mr. Hay, approved by Mr. Hay, and presented to Morrison, the disbursing clerk. At that time the voucher contained nothing but the name of Rosenthal. After the money had been drawn and the voucher had passed out of the hands of Michael there was indorsed upon it that it was for the picture and frame of ex-Secretary of State Day. This was done by a clerk. Under the law, the Secretary had the right to take the money and use it for purposes for which that fund was provided, and for which an appropriation is made every year, without any voucher whatsoever. Michael says that he inadvertently sent the voucher to Rosenthal and that Rosenthal inadvertently signed it and sent it back.

It should not have been sent to or signed by him. A receipt was taken from Rosenthal, signed by him, showing that he received the true amount, namely, $790, for the picture, and that $60 was to be paid for the frame. I submit if Michael had intended to steal the $1,600 he would not have put into the file a receipt showing that the whole $2,450 was not paid for the picture and frame. Michael says he retained $850 to pay for the portrait and frame and paid over the $1,600 to Mr. Hay. There is not a scintilla of evidence to contradict this statement. Mr. Hay had the right under the law to expend it without a voucher. Have we a right to assume, without evidence, that he did not do this? Under the long-continued practice of the department, the portrait of former Secretary Day could be legally paid for out of this fund. It was so paid, as shown by the Rosenthal receipt. This accounts for the entire $2,450. Where is the evidence of any misappropriation? Yet the majority of the committee assume misappropriation from lack of evidence and ask us to find these two men guilty of it. It will be an outrage upon justice if we do it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that all gentlemen who have spoken on this matter may be allowed to extend their remarks in the RECORD for five legislative days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken or may speak on this resolution shall have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall not object if it is understood that gentlemen are not going to print in the RECORD the entire proceedings contained in the record of the committee maybe half a dozen times in connection with their remarks. I do not know how long their hearings are.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to couple with that request a request to print in the RECORD the majority report. The minority views were printed in this morning's RECORD, and I think the majority report ought to go into the RECORD also.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] couples with the request of the gentleman from Connecticut a request that he have the right to print the majority views in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Following is the majority report referred to:

PORTRAIT AND FRAME OF FORMER SECRETARY OF STATE WILLIAM R. DAY.

Mr. DENT, from the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, submitted the following report, to accompany House resolution 103.

Your committee, under House resolution No. 103 adopted at the present session of Congress, having had under consideration the conduct and expenditures of the Department of State, beg leave at this time to submit a partial report relating exclusively to the payment for the portrait and frame for the portrait of former Secretary of State William R. Day, now an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Your committee find that ex-Secretary, now Associate Justice, Day, at the request of the State Department, agreed with one Albert Rosenthal, of Philadelphia, Pa., for the painting of his portrait as ex-Secretary of State, to be placed in the State Department with other portraits of a similar kind; that the agreed price, including the frame, was $850.

Your committee further find and report that after the portrait was painted and the frame purchased they were accepted by and delivered to the State Department; that in receiving payment for the portrait the said Rosenthal dealt exclusively with W. H. Michael, then chief clerk in the State Department; that at the request of the said Michael the said Rosenthal signed a blank voucher which he delivered to the said Michael, either personally or through the mail, his recollection being that it was by the latter method; that subsequently, about two months later, the said Rosenthal received from the said Michael his, the latter's, individual check for $790, that being the sum due the said Rosenthal, the balance of said sum of $850, to wit, $60, being the price paid for the frame to the Fisher Art Co., of Washington, D. C.

It is the opinion of your committee that the practice of signing vouchers in blank is not only unbusinesslike and inexcusable, but amounts to a virtual invitation to wrongdoing, and such practice can not be too strongly condemned.

Your committee further find and report that about two years after the transaction thus above detailed, to wit, in 1906, the said Rosenthal was interviewed by the State Department relative to the painting of another portrait for that department; that then and there he was informed that while his work was satisfactory his price was too high. Whereupon the said Rosenthal was shown the voucher signed about two years previously in blank, and said voucher appearing solely to be for the portrait and frame of portrait of ex-Secretary Day, disclosed that the sum of $2,450 had been paid for the same. According to the testimony before your committee this was the first information that the said Rosenthal had that the voucher represented an excess of $1,600 over the price actually paid for the portrait.

Your committee further find and report that at the time the above voucher was signed and the money paid for the portrait, one Thomas W. Morrison was the disbursing clerk of the State Department and has remained in such position since and up to the present time.

Your committee further find and report that the said Morrison, as such disbursing clerk, on the verbal request only of the said Michael as chief clerk, drew a warrant on the Treasury Department for the sum of $2,450, which was cashed through one of the messengers of the disbursing bureau on the 16th day of January, 1904, and the money deposited in the safe in the office of Morrison as such disbursing clerk, where it remained until the 18th day of January, 1904, when the said Morrison delivered in person to the said Michael the sum of $2,450, taking no personal receipt, but relying alone on the said voucher signed by Rosenthal.

The committee further find that although this sum of $2,450 was paid over to Michael by Morrison in January, 1904, Rosenthal was not actually paid by Michael until March, 1904, and the Fisher Art Co. in June, 1904.

The said Morrison testified before your committee that when he delivered the sum of $2,450 to the said Michael he learned, either from Michael or some one in his office, that the money was to be paid for the portrait and frame of the portrait of ex-Secretary Day. At that time, according to the testimony of Morrison, there was nothing on the voucher to indicate the purpose for which this sum was to be ultilized. After paying over this money to Michael and returning to his office, the said Morrison within 30 minutes caused a clerk in his office to write with pen and ink in parentheses on the voucher the following: "For the portrait of Judge Day, late Secretary of State." The said Morrison testified before your committee that he caused this memorandum on the voucher to be made for his own protection. Morrison further testified before your committee that never before nor since had, or has, he drawn money and paid out the same under similar circumstances.

Upon further investigation your committee ascertain and report that in 1906 when the matter of the above voucher was investigated by the State Department, at the time presided over by ex-Secretary (now Senator) ROOT, Michael, who was then and now is consul general of the United States at Calcutta, reported that he paid the money received from Morrison to Secretary of State Hay, and while he did not know, he presumed that he used the difference in relation to the emergency or secret fund authorized by section 291 of the Revised Statutes for some item or items relating to foreign affairs. At the time that Michael made this report Secretary Hay was dead.

When your committee started the investigation of this transaction a request was made for the voucher relating to the same, and it was reported to be lost.

Morrison testified during the first of this investigation that he had delivered the papers in 1906 to Mr. Denby, then chief clerk of the State Department, under Secretary ROOT, and that so far as he knew they had not been returned, nor had he seen them since, although he had made a careful and thorough search for the same on several occasions.

The present Secretary of State, Hon. Philander C. Knox, reported to your committee that he had ordered a thorough search to be made for these papers and had received the report that they could not be found.

The papers, including the voucher, were delivered up by Morrison on a telephone request merely. Such practice in the matter of preserving files can not be too severely condemned.

While this investigation was pending it was suddenly disclosed to your committee that the voucher had been picked up on the floor of the office of the said Disbursing Clerk Morrison within 5 or 6 feet of Morrison's desk, near the wastebasket, by one of the messengers in that bureau, and said voucher has been shown to your committee and is now in the personal possession of the Secretary of State. This was not disclosed to the committee for a week or 10 days after the voucher was so picked up. The circumstances under which this voucher was discovered, especially after the matter had been given so much publicity, are too simple for human credulity.

The conduct of the present officials of the State Department in trying to conceal and in fact in concealing from your committee, for about 10 days, the fact that the long-lost and much-sought-for voucher had been found, does not comport with an honest effort on their part to have all the facts connected with this doubtful transaction made known, and said conduct can not therefore be commended by your committee.

Your committee further ascertain and report that the only suggestion as to the proper use of the $1,600 unaccounted for, is the fact that it was used by Secretary Hay under the authority contained in section 291 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which reads as follows:

"SEC. 291. * * * Whenever any sum of money has been or shall be issued, from the Treasury, for the purpose of intercourse or treaty with foreign nations, in pursuance of any law, the President is authorized to cause the same to be duly settled annually, with the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, by causing the same to be accounted for, specifically, if the expenditure may, in his judgment, be made public; and by making or causing the Secretary of State to make a certificate of the amount of such expenditures as he may think it advisable not to specify and every such certificate shall be deemed a sufficient voucher for the sum therein expressed to have been expended."

This section in substance authorizes the President to cause any sum of money that has been or shall be issued from the Treasury for the purpose of intercourse or treaty with foreign nations to be accounted for specifically if the expenditure, in his judgment, should be made public; and by making, or causing the Secretary of State to make, a certificate of the amount of such expenditure as he may think it advisable not to specify. In the latter event such certificate is deemed a sufficient voucher, without more, for the sum expended.

Under this state of facts your committee beg leave to submit the following conclusions, together with the testimony taken on the hearing, and recommend that this report lie on the table and be ordered to be printed:

First. That under the authority of section 291 neither the President nor the Secretary of State has any power to pay for portraits of ex-Secretaries of State; and the payment of $850 for said portrait and frame out of said fund was, in the judgment of your committee, a misappropriation of said sum.

Second. That no voucher specifying the payee or the nature of the payment is required when either the President or the Secretary of State acting under the President desires to use a sum of money for the purpose of intercourse or treaty with foreign nations and deems it advisable that the same should not be disclosed to the public.

Third. That the sum of $2,450 having been traced by your committee into one single voucher which on its face relates only to the payment for the portrait of ex-Secretary Day and bears no relation whatever to foreign affairs; and there being no information, after full investigation and opportunity to be heard, as to the expenditure of the said $1,600, your committee feel constrained to report that the said sum has been misappropriated.

Fourth. The undisputed facts show that this sum of $1,600 was in the possession of Morrison as disbursing clerk and Michael as chief clerk, and its disposition is unaccounted for except by the letter of Michael to the State Department in 1906 that he turned the same over to Secretary Hay, who at the time of said letter was dead.

Fifth. Your committee think it incredible that the late Secretary Hay either appropriated this $1,600 to his own use, or that he personally and without the knowledge or assistance of some subordinate in the State Department, used the same in payment for some matter relating to intercourse or treaty with foreign nations, either of which he must have done if the said $1,600 is to be accounted for as having been actually handled by Secretary Hay. The only intimation tending to reflect upon Secretary Hay comes from the letter of Michael, and this we do not believe, for, apart from Secretary Hay's high character, he could easily have signed a voucher for this sum to be expended in foreign relations.

Sixth. The conclusion reached by your committee seems irresistible that either this sum of $1,600 was jointly misappropriated by Michael and Morrison, or individually by Michael, either through the incompetence or the connivance of Morrison.

Seventh. That Michael, who is now holding the responsible position of consul general at Calcutta, India, and Morrison, who still holds the perhaps still more responsible position of disbursing clerk of the State Department, should long since have been removed from office, and that even now it is not too late to remove both of said officials for the good of the public service.

Your committee has not finished its labors, but in view of the fact that even an amount as small as $1,600 is either unaccounted for, or accounted for in a most remarkable manner by officers still holding responsible positions under Federal authority, it is deemed wise that this report should now be made with the hope that the present executive authority may relieve the public service of such officials and restore confidence in those who handle the public funds and represent us in important positions abroad.

In conclusion, in view of the statute of limitations and the difficulty of proof, resulting from death and lapse of time, your committee deem it unnecessary to make any suggestion or recommendation relative to criminal prosecution of either Michael or Morrison.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, on the 17th day of April of this year the House passed a resolution known as House resolution 103, authorizing certain committees on expenditures in various executive departments of the Government to proceed to examine into all the affairs of said departments as fully as possible. It was expressly provided in this resolution that the investigations provided for by it should cover such period in the past as each of said committees may deem necessary. It was further provided in the resolution that these investigations might take place either before a full committee or a subcommittee duly provided for.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department has zealously and earnestly undertaken to discharge the responsibilities imposed upon it by the resolution to which I have just called the attention of the House. But I understand from some gentlemen here that when the committee finds something, when the committee discovers some facts, it is the opinion of those gentlemen that the committee ought to let those facts remain hidden in its own room and not bring them before this House, because otherwise we might be charged with muckraking. Why, Mr. Speaker, for what purpose was this resolution introduced? What was the object in the minds of the membership of this House in agreeing to this resolution, if they did not expect the committees that were appointed to investigate the facts and bring the facts before the House? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Some gentlemen seem to be afraid that this committee is reporting something that will hurt the feelings of some members of the executive department of the Government. [Applause on the Democratic side.] My conscience, Mr. Speaker! It is the very object of this investigation by these committees to investigate the different departments of the Government because we believe something is wrong. We have not had a real honest, sincere, earnest investigation of the different departments of the Government by the Congress of the United States since 1874. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], my colleague on the committee, told you that, in effect, to-day, when he said as a Republican member of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, that you had no meetings during his eight years until the Democrats came into power. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now I want to say, Mr. Speaker, if it is the policy on that side or on this side of the House—I do not care on which side it comes—that these investigations are simply to be made for the purpose of giving newspapers a chance to fill up their columns, then I refuse to serve on any such committee any further. [Applause on the Democratic side.] When we get facts and present them to the House it is the only body to which we can submit them, and they ought to be heard and they ought to be heard candidly and fairly.

Now, right here, before I proceed to discuss the facts, I want to say that I have heard among some Members—I regret to say on this side of the House—a sentimental suggestion that Michael has not had a hearing before this committee. They agree, and every Member who talked with me agrees, that the prima facie case, supported by the evidence and reported by the committee, makes it a case of guilt against Mr. Michael. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Not a single man who has examined this proposition questions the fact that a prima facie case is made out against him. "But," they say, "you ought to have had him before the committee, and you ought to have given him an opportunity to be heard." There are so many reasons, there are so many suggestions, in reply to this subterfuge—and it is a subterfuge—that I hardly know with which one to begin. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In the first place, Mr. Knox, as Secretary of State, was before the committee, and his attention was called to the fact that there was a voucher purporting on its face to pay Albert Rosenthal $2,450, when, as a matter of fact, he received only $850. Mr. Knox called the attention of Mr. Michael to this fact by cablegram, and Mr. Michael responded to Mr. Knox, his superior officer, that he did not know anything more about this transaction than what is contained in the letter which he had written to Secretary ROOT when he investigated it in 1906.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. DENT. Just for a question.

Mr. TILSON. I know the gentleman wishes to be fair.

Mr. DENT. Oh, certainly the gentleman wishes to be fair; but I yield for a question.

Mr. TILSON. Were there not in this hearing many references to Mr. Michael reflecting upon him, which, if he were present in person or if he could read this record, he would be given an opportunity to explain? Is not that a fact?

Mr. DENT. I will answer the gentleman's question. I was coming to that. Mr. Knox informed Mr. Michael that this situation was pending before the committee, and he had an opportunity to come here, in the first place; and he could have come here if the Secretary of State wanted him to come. [Applause on the Democratic side.] On the 29th day of May Mr. Knox informed Mr. Michael by cablegram that this matter was pending and that he ought to report on it. On the 5th day of July we made our report without hearing anything from him. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. Was there any statement sent to Mr. Michael touching the statement of Mr. Rosenthal that he had not received the money on the date that the signed voucher shows it to have been received?

Mr. DENT. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that all the committee could get was the report of Mr. Michael's superior officer, Mr. Knox, the Secretary of State, and he reported that he had informed Mr. Michael of this transaction and had received in reply the statement that he had said in his letter all that he had to say.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I have carefully read that cablegram from Mr. Michael, but the point is whether he was informed of the particular matter to which I refer. The cablegram simply informed him of the investigation into the affair. After that there came up the very material fact, if it be a fact, that the money was not paid to Rosenthal by Michael at the time the receipt shows it to have been paid. That is a material fact in the case. Was any notice of that fact brought to the attention of Mr. Michael or any answer had from him touching it?

Mr. DENT. By the committee?

Mr. SHERLEY. By the committee, or anyone else.

Mr. DENT. I can only answer for the committee. The committee did not, but the committee informed Mr. Michael's chief of these facts, and he had the opportunity to give Mr. Michael these facts, and then he had the opportunity to answer them.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. HAMLIN. The testimony of Mr. Rosenthal showed that he was paid by check from Mr. Michael, and that that check was not drawn until March 22. Consequently, Mr. Michael, if present, certainly could not have disputed the record evidence of that check.

Mr. SHERLEY. Was there any explanation of it?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I mean any explanation by Mr. Michael.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Rosenthal said that Michael told him he would have to wait for an appropriation.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Rosenthal said that, but did Mr. Michael have an opportunity to deny that?

Mr. HAMLIN. There has been no contradiction of that all along the line.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, some lawyers who defend criminals, and they have the right of defense, have expressed in this House the sentimental idea that Michael has not had a hearing. I want to ask those lawyers if they ever heard of a grand jury that was about to present an indictment inviting a defendant to come before that body and say why he should not be indicted? Who ever heard of any such procedure as that? Under the better rulings, as I understand it——

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. As I understand it, the House of Representatives can not prefer an indictment, but in one sense it is in the position of a grand jury, and can on a prima facie or any other case place a man who holds public office on trial by articles of impeachment.

Mr. DENT. I am glad the gentleman from Illinois asked that question. That is the next proposition I was coming to. Under the better authority, as I read it, this Congress has the right and power to impeach Michael and Morrison. If the committee, instead of giving them an opportunity to be heard before the President, had decided to ask this Congress to impeach Michael and Morrison, does any man on that side contend that we would have had to have Michael and Morrison present before we recommended that? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, this suggestion is a fraud, this argument is a farce; it is silly, and gentlemen know it. So far as this resolution is concerned, it does not remove either Michael or Morrison from office. It takes really the best view for them that it could possibly take in recommending to the President that they ought to be dismissed.

Why, we only say, "Mr. President, here are certain facts disclosed with reference to men who are occupying public office under the Government of the United States. We say that the public service ought not to have such men, under these facts, in power. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We recommend to you these facts, and we say that under these facts these two men ought to be removed." No man on the other side of the House has ever suggested and no man on the other side of the House, if he has any respect for his ability as a lawyer, will ever suggest that the result of this report means the dismissal or removal from office of Michael or Morrison. It simply means that we present to the Executive, who has the power of appointment and the power of removal, these facts, and say, "You have these men in office, and you ought to remove them."

Now, gentlemen on that side—and, I am sorry to say, some on this side seem to agree with them—say that we are taking advantage of a man that lives over in Calcutta and that we convict him without giving him an opportunity to be heard. Why, that is convicting the President of the United States, that is convicting those in high authority of saying that they will turn these men out without giving them a further opportunity to be heard. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The whole purport of this resolution is simply to say to the President we have found these facts, and under these facts these men ought to be removed from office. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It does not remove them, and if the President removes them without giving them a hearing, then the President has violated the rule that the gentlemen on the other side invoked. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to use that much time to answer this maudlin, sentimental argument that the man who is charged here has not had his day in court.

But, Mr. Speaker, I want to go a step further. I have not the time to criticize the report of the minority, I have not the time to state that their criticism of the fact that the full instead of a subcommittee ought to have made this investigation. I will simply, in passing on this subject, state this fact, that I want my friends on the other side to listen to: This subcommittee was composed of the chairman, HAMLIN, and myself as majority members and Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota as the ranking Republican member of the committee. The Democratic side of this House did not select Mr. DAVIS to go on that committee; he was selected by the Republican organization on that side of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We had nothing to do with it, and yet he subscribes to this report in toto, and he is the only member of the Republicans that was represented on that committee who was present and stood face to face and eyed the witnesses in this transaction. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Ah, my friend from Michigan says that he did not have an opportunity to be there. I have no doubt that if he had had an opportunity to be there and cross-examine somebody this result would have been very different. But I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan that he was unfair to the chairman of this committee, he was unfair to the clerk of the committee, and he was unfair to himself, because all of those hearings were public and all he had to do was to request the chairman or the clerk to let him know when there was going to be a meeting of the committee. There was no secrecy about the hearings, and the gentleman had the fairest opportunity in the world to be present, and the chairman would have permitted him to ask any questions that he wanted to, if he thought the ranking Republican member of the committee was not representing the administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I can go on and criticize the report of the minority in many other particulars, but my time has about expired.

We are accused, Mr. Speaker, of assassination—of assassinating somebody's character. I doubt if any such report has ever been filed before in Congress. We are accused of assassinating character and striking somebody from behind.

We are accused of besmirching the character of Secretary Hay, when the report expressly and unequivocally states that the committee does not believe Secretary Hay ever handled a dime of this $1,600 that is unaccounted for; and notwithstanding the fact that the printed report on its face contradicts this charge, and notwithstanding the fact that the chairman of this committee has stood upon the floor of this House and said it was not true, gentlemen on the other side, in order to bolster up a weak case, continue to pervert the facts and misstate the record. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that this committee has reported that Michael and Morrison were guilty in this transaction. The committee reported that Michael misappropriated this fund individually, or that he conjointly misappropriated it with Morrison, and that Morrison, if he were not guilty of misappropriation, through his incompetence aided Michael in misappropriating this fund. That is the proposition that the report makes. I want to state now the reasons why, and I call attention to the record in that particular—why the committee reached the conclusion as to Morrison.

In the first place, he drew his warrant on the Treasury and collected in cash $2,450 on the mere verbal request of Michael as chief clerk. Second, he retained this cash in his possession for two days, and then delivered the same in person to Michael, taking no personal receipt and receiving only a voucher purporting to be signed by Albert Rosenthal, which voucher at that time did not contain any specific statement as to what it was for. Third, subsequently and after the payment of this sum to Michael, and after receiving the Rosenthal voucher from Michael, Morrison caused to be written on the face of the voucher that it was for the portrait of Judge Day, late Secretary of State, because as he says he was informed in Michael's office that it was for that portrait. Fourth, this voucher was never turned over to the Auditor of the Treasury Department, which was charged with the responsibility of auditing his accounts. Fifth, when the committee began this investigation Morrison reported that this voucher was lost, and stated that he had not seen it since it had been turned over to Mr. Denby, the then chief clerk in the State Department in 1906 under Secretary ROOT.

Sixth. This voucher was reported to be suddenly found while this investigation was pending by a messenger on the floor of Mr. Morrison's office while Mr. Morrison was sitting at his desk, and near a wastebasket within 5 or 6 feet of his desk, the messenger stating that it was in an envelope with a rubber band around it, and that Mr. Morrison before he pulled it out said, "Why, this is the voucher they have been seeking so long." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Seventh. This voucher was intact and unmutilated in every respect, and the office had been swept every day; but not only that, the voucher was found in an office in a different building than the building in which it was when it was delivered to Mr. Denby. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Eighth. Then we find this discrepancy between the testimony of Mr. Morrison and his man Sangston, who found this unmutilated voucher near the wastebasket. Sangston said that when he found the voucher it was in a long envelope with a rubber band around it, and Morrison said that it was just folded together and did not have anything around it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] When that happened in the committee, and I asked him the question about it, some of the newspaper boys around there laughed, and then he changed his testimony and said he did not know whether it had an envelope and a rubber band around it or not. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Ninth. According to Mr. Morrison's own testimony this item was not entered upon his books for two years after this transaction occurred.

Tenth. Then when the voucher was found there was with it a receipt about which we have heard some talk here to-day, for $790, signed by Rosenthal, written on plain paper, but the presence of this receipt with the voucher is not even attempted to be explained, and the first time anybody ever heard of this $790 receipt from Rosenthal was when this mysterious voucher was found in another building from the building in which it was delivered.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I can not yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, these are the facts, and yet gentlemen of the minority call us assassins of character, with these facts in the record that are undisputed.

I want to come now to the Michael case, because I have not much time left. The undisputed facts in this case disclose that Rosenthal, the artist who painted this picture, dealt exclusively with Michael as a representative of the State Department; that he secured from Rosenthal a blank voucher for this portrait.

That he verbally requested of Morrison to collect $2,450 and turn it over to him in cash, which he received. This sum of $2,450 obtained by Morrison on the face of the voucher signed by Rosenthal is traced by the committee into the hands of Michael. The voucher itself purports on its face to be alone for the payment of the portrait of Judge Day. The undisputed facts disclose that the portrait and the frame cost only $850. So that Michael is found in possession of $1,600 which is absolutely unaccounted for except his bare statement that he turned the same over to Secretary Hay, who at the time of the statement was dead.

The majority expressly find that Secretary Hay, if he received this sum, either must have appropriated it to his own use or have expended it in matters relating to foreign affairs through his own hands and without intervention, knowledge, or assistance of any subordinate in his department. The committee expressly find that they do not believe that the money was handled by Secretary Hay at all. He is absolutely acquitted by the majority in this transaction, but notwithstanding the fact that the committee expressly acquits Secretary Hay, the minority in their views, in the face of this express acquittal, inexcusably perverts and unpardonably misstates a fact clearly apparent in the record by charging the majority with an attempt to besmirch the character of Secretary Hay after his death.

When it thus appears that the Members of the House are willing to subscribe their names to a statement of this character in the face of the clear, positive, and emphatic language of the report any other statement made in the minority report should carry little weight in every other respect.

We have said that we did not credit the statement that Secretary Hay actually handled this $1,600, and the reason we have for our conclusions are many.

In the first place, we do not believe that he would have adopted the crude and absolutely unnecessary method of securing a voucher from a portrait painter, whose claim was only about $800, in order to collect from the Treasury about twice that sum. That such a procedure on his part would be crude and unnecessary is apparent when we look to section 291, which authorizes the President, through the Secretary of State, to expend the so-called emergency fund relating to foreign affairs without specifically accounting for the expenditure. Under the practice in this regard the Secretary may make, at the instance of the President, at the close of each quarter a certificate that a lump sum had been expended under the appropriation for emergencies in the foreign service, and the Auditor of the Treasury is bound to accept such certificate without further specification or detail. In the next place, we know as a matter of common knowledge that Cabinet officers must necessarily rely on subordinates in carrying out the details of transactions and also in furnishing statements as to the amount of expenditures, and especially would this be true in such a relationship as the chief clerk bears to the Secretary of State. It seems absurd to assume that Secretary Hay accepted in person this $1,600 and paid it over out of his own hands to some one in connection with the foreign service, and this without the knowledge of any subordinate in the department and without any record whatever of the transaction.

That Michael retained at least the sum of $790 due Rosenthal from January 18 until about March 20, a period of two months, and the sum of $60 due the Fisher Art Co. from January 18 until sometime in June is clearly established by the evidence.

Is is true the majority draws this conclusion from the fact that Rosenthal deposited the amount received by him on March 22, and the Fisher Art Co. the amount due them sometime in June. But it is unreasonable to assume that Rosenthal carried his check from Michael two months before depositing it, and that the Fisher Art Co. carried their check for five months before depositing the same. On the contrary, the presumption is otherwise, and, in addition to this, Rosenthal said that his financial condition was not such that he would have been likely to have retained this check for any unreasonable length of time before using it. During the intervening period between the time Michael got the money and the time he paid it to Rosenthal, Rosenthal testified that Michael continued to put him off with the plea that he would have to wait until an appropriation was available.

Such conduct on the part of Michael can not be said to be consistent with that of honesty.

Another fact in this connection, tending with the others to conclusively establish Michael's guilt, is the fact that he paid for the portrait by his individual check. Such is the best impression of Rosenthal, and the committee has been furnished with no Treasury warrant for such amount.

And, again, we find Michael admitting in his letter to Secretary Root, dated May 7, 1906, that the voucher was to be signed by him and not by Rosenthal, and that if the latter signed it instead of a receipt, it was through error. If error was made, it was made by Michael, as he sent the voucher to Rosenthal to be signed in blank, and turned the same over to Morrison when Morrison turned over to him the $2,450. But a conclusive reason, it seems to me, why Michael's account of his receipt and disbursement of this $1,600 can not possibly be accepted is the fact that the committee has been informed that it is the custom of the State Department to keep in the office of the disbursing clerk a voucher of each item of money expended under this emergency fund, although these vouchers are not disclosed to the Treasury Department. It is necessary, of course, to do this, so that the different items may be added up at the end of the quarter to enable the Secretary of State to give his certificate of the total to the Auditor of the Treasury; and we find our friends of the minority, thanks to their zeal to sustain the State Department in all its branches and among all subordinates, admitting such to be the fact by using this language, on page 4:

> It is submitted that the best evidence of the honesty and care with which the fund in question is administered is that the Chief of the Bureau of Accounts, whom the committee would have dismissed in disgrace, has in every case a voucher, approved by the Secretary of State, for the moneys expended from this fund.

This being true, if the $1,600 was legitimately expended out of this fund under section 291, there is to-day on file in the office of Mr. Morrison a voucher, approved by Secretary Hay, explaining the expenditure of this sum. It can not be said after this length of time, especially in view of the suspicion surrounding this transaction, that such a voucher is clothed with such great secrecy that it could not be disclosed to the committee now. To have disclosed even the fact that there was a voucher for $1,600 about this particular date on file in said office would have gone a long way to have disproven the prima facie case made out by the testimony, and certainly the production of such a voucher itself might have cleared the skirts of all concerned. This not being done, the conclusion is irresistible that Michael informed Secretary Hay that the portrait and frame cost $2,450, and thus secured his signature, or that he requested him to sign a voucher stating that it was for this portrait, and that he would fill it out.

To summarize, Michael received the money in cash. He retained at least a part of it for two months under a false statement of fact. He paid the money finally by his own individual check, and accounts for the $1,600 difference by saying that he had paid the same to a dead man. And all the while, if such payment had been honestly made, there would be on file in the office of the Bureau of Accounts a voucher explaining the same.

In connection with this report it may not be amiss to call attention to an act known as section 291 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, by which the President of the United States, or the Secretary of State acting under the instructions of the President, may publish or not, in their discretion, the amount of money used in matters relating to foreign affairs.

It can be readily understood that there are times and circumstances which demand that the executive authority acting through the State Department should preserve with the utmost secrecy matters relating to international affairs. But to give to the Executive through the State Department power to conceal for all time the expenditures relating to foreign affairs is contrary to the genius of our institution and the theory upon which our Republic was originally founded.

And here we call attention to section 9 of Article I of the Constitution, which provides that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of the appropriation made by a law, and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time."

Under this section of the Constitution it seems clear that Congress itself has no authority to enact a law which would give to any department of the Government authority to expend the public money without being subject to account for the same at any time.

Perhaps Congress could authorize the expenditure to be kept a secret for a time, but to give to the Executive a right to expend money without any specific and public accountability at any time clearly violates the provision of the Constitution above cited.

It may be said that when Congress appropriates a sum of money, say, to wit, $100,000 for expenditure in the diplomatic and foreign service, it is immaterial whether or not a statement and account of the receipt and expenditure of this sum should be made public, item by item, and that a mere statement that a lump sum out of that appropriation has been expended would, for all practical purposes, be sufficient.

The answer to this is that neither a statement nor an account would be furnished, for these words have a peculiar significance, both in ordinary language and in mercantile matters. The use of such words would be understood by the ordinary individual as well as the expert bookkeeper to mean an itemized, detailed statement or account and not a mere collected summary or lump sum.

It is well known in the law that when words have the same meaning both in ordinary parlance and among those who specially and constantly use them, any other definition of them would be absurd.

In addition to this, the legal question involved, such legislation not only paves the way for corruption but there can be no necessity for it.

Among kings and other potentates, when intrigue and deceit constituted the highest qualities of diplomacy, such a secret system of expenditure may have been a necessity. But this Government, founded upon a written constitution with express, specific, and limited power, and leading the world in the march of progress, liberty, and honesty, can not and will not tolerate such an ancient and now dishonored custom.

Under such authority Congress might appropriate $100,000 to be used in secrecy in matters relating to intercourse or treaty with foreign nations and the whole of it could be appropriated to personal rather than public use. It will not suffice to say that no man could receive office in this country who would be guilty of such perfidy. It is sufficient, however, to say that no governmental necessity calls for the creation of any such temptation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to withdraw the substitute I offered on yesterday [applause on the Democratic side], and submit the following amendment to resolution No. 246. It is to strike out all after the word "resolved" and substitute the following——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri withdraws the substitute offered on yesterday and offers the one which the Clerk will report.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LENROOT. Are we now proceeding under the five-minute rule?

The SPEAKER. We are.

Mr. MANN. Has the resolution been read?

Mr. HEFLIN. Let us have the substitute read.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order the substitute is not in order until the resolution is read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution and then read the proposed substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 246.

Resolved, That the findings contained in the report of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, presented to the House on the 5th day of July, 1911, and known as Report No. 59, be concurred in and adopted.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I now offer in the nature of a substitute the amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the findings of fact as contained in Report No. 59 be approved and submitted to the President, with the recommendation that he take appropriate action touching the same.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to the original resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] offers an amendment——

Mr. HAMLIN. But, Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Have not I the floor to discuss my substitute?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is not an amendment to the original resolution in order before it is in order to proceed to the consideration of a substitute to the resolution?

Mr. OLMSTED. It being an amendment to perfect the original resolution.

The SPEAKER. The modus operandi is that one amendment to the original resolution is in order and a substitute is in order and one amendment to the substitute.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair just stated, as I understood, in answer to my parliamentary inquiry, that one amendment to the original resolution was in order. I think there is no limitation in the rules as to the number of amendments which may be offered to the original resolution, so far as they are in order.

The SPEAKER. None whatever, if they are voted down. You can offer amendments during these 30 minutes as fast as you can vote them down, but there can be but one amendment to the resolution and one amendment to the substitute all pending at once.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understand that, Mr. Speaker, but my parliamentary inquiry is this: How does the gentleman from Wisconsin get the floor to offer his amendment at this time? I thought I had the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri did have the floor, and he has it now, if he will proceed to use it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have not had an opportunity.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will state it.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor to offer an amendment to the original resolution before consideration is had upon the substitute.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is in order. The Clerk will report the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend House resolution 246 by striking out the words "concurred in and adopted" and insert in lieu thereof the words "transmitted to the President of the United States together with the minority views and the testimony taken by said committee relating thereto."

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is entitled to speak to his amendment for five minutes, and then the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] will be entitled to five minutes. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I think the amendment which I have offered requires no extended explanation to the House. The purport and effect of the amendment which I have offered is that if adopted the House will not act one way or the other upon the question of the guilt or innocence of the two men involved in this resolution. It strikes out from the resolution the approval of the findings of the committee and requires that the findings of the committee, together with the minority views and all testimony, shall be transmitted to the President of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, that, it seems to me, is the solution of this question and ought to be agreed to upon both sides of this Chamber. It does not seem to be possible, Mr. Speaker, that a majority of this House, without being conversant with this testimony, without having read it in full—as they have frankly admitted they have not—are ready to vote to convict two men of criminal offenses and ask the President of the United States to pass sentence upon them.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. LENROOT. I do.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does not the substitute offered by the chairman of this committee mean that the President shall not consider this testimony except upon one side of this proposition?

Mr. MANN. He can not consider it at all. He will have to take the findings of fact.

Mr. LENROOT. The substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] is in nowise different from the original resolution, for if that substitute be adopted every man who votes for it in this House votes a verdict of guilty of felony upon these two men. I do not believe that this House is ready to do that thing. Everything will be accomplished that ought to be accomplished by the adoption of the amendment which I have proposed. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that no good objection can be urged against the resolution which I have just had read from the desk. If the resolution of the gentleman from Wisconsin is to prevail, then you would take from this House and from your committee of investigation all authority, all power, all jurisdiction, and transfer it back to the President and the Secretary of State to make their own investigation and to take such action as they may deem proper. In other words, you would only make your committee a kind of a vehicle to gather facts for the consideration of the President. But you would say our committee must not express an opinion upon those facts.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to know for information if one of the findings of fact is that one of these men has misappropriated the money?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will answer that, and I am glad the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] suggested it. I want you all to hear me upon this proposition. There is not a man listening to me now who is honest with himself that will not admit that the $850 was a misappropriation of public funds. [Cries of "Oh, no!"]

The money paid for this portrait was taken out of the emergency or secret fund, and any man who has any regard, it seems to me, for his reputation must admit that it is a misappropriation to pay that money out of that emergency or secret fund for portraits.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAMLIN. Just a moment. But there is a finding which the evidence tends strongly to prove, and we believe that Michael misappropriated this $1,600.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to be clear. The resolution proposes that we——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will yield.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is an important matter, I think. The proposed substitute is to the effect that the findings of fact in the report be approved. I desire to know whether, in the opinion of the gentleman from Missouri, one of the findings of fact that will be approved is a finding that Michael misappropriated the $1,600?

Mr. HAMLIN. That is the conclusion of the committee. We believe that that is true, and we believe that the evidence shows that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is that a finding in the report?

Mr. HAMLIN. I have not the report before me, but I can read it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. As to the conclusions which the gentleman designates as "findings"?

Mr. HAMLIN. "Michael is now holding the responsible position of consul general at Calcutta." That is in No. 6. This is the conclusion, based on our findings of fact:

The conclusion reached by your committee seems irresistible that either this sum of $1,600 was jointly misappropriated by Michael and Morrison or individually by Michael, either through the incompetence or connivance of Morrison.

The opinion seems to be irresistible, and I want to say to you, gentlemen, I have not one particle of doubt about it in my own mind.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. I can not yield now. I have only five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri declines to yield.

Mr. HAMLIN. Now, gentlemen, I want to say to you on the substitute that I have offered—you talk about it being hardly courtesy to recommend to the President that he take a certain action. Out of deference to that suggestion, upon that side and upon this side, and not wishing to be discourteous to the President, of course, I have offered this amendment, which simply takes to the President this report and all the testimony, with the indorsement of this House, if it carries, that you approve this report—the findings of fact in this report—and asks the President to take such action touching the matter as he believes he ought to take.

Mr. RICHARDSON. On the evidence?

Mr. HAMLIN. On the evidence. That is the point exactly. If the President does not think he ought to dismiss these men, then he takes the responsibility of retaining them.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The SPEAKER. It can not be done except by modification of the rule that has been adopted.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] can reach his point by asking unanimous consent to modify the rule.

Mr. HAMLIN. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I do not think we should ask for it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado will state it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I wish to ask whether a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin would be in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that it would not be. An amendment to the substitute of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] would be in order.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It would have to be germane, would it not?

The SPEAKER. Of course it would.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I have an amendment that I would like to offer, but it would have to be read in order to enable the Chair to determine if it would be germane or not.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair is for. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I will offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado offers an amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That further consideration of House resolution 246 and report No. 59 of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department be postponed until said committee concludes its investigation of said department and renders its final report thereon; that the committee procure the attendance and testimony of the said W. H. Michael; and that the minority report be stricken from the files of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that the amendment is not germane. It is out of order.

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] solves this difficulty and solves it rightly. I am thoroughly convinced that this House is not going to vote in haste, with no opportunity to defend himself, a condemnation of W. H. Michael. I am just as well satisfied of that as I am that I am standing here, because the sense of justice of gentlemen on the other side, as well as that of gentlemen on this side, will not permit them to do that. We may divide along partisan lines, and we do; but when it comes down to questions of fundamental justice we are all Americans, and we believe in the right and will do the right as God gives us the ability to see it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And so I have no question whatever as to the result upon this vote, if gentlemen will only understand it. The proposition offered by our friend from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] is the same thing, in different words, as was presented to you before. The proposition that was before us, that Judge HARDWICK said would be offered—and which he, of course, believed would be—has not been offered.

Mr. HAMLIN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. It was offered.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MADISON. I can not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MADISON. There are seven findings of fact. I used to deal with findings of fact for a number of years, and I think I know them when I see them. There are seven of them here, and they in explicit and unmistakable terms condemn these men, and recommend their dismissal from the public service. There is no other conclusion to be drawn.

As to this substitute that has been offered by Mr. HAMLIN, if you vote for it you simply vote for something that you did not intend to do—you gentlemen on the other side who are opposed to the condemnation of this man without giving him an opportunity to be heard.

Now, where should this whole matter go? To the President of the United States. Whether he be a Republican or a Democrat, you and I know that he does not want a man at Calcutta representing this Government, if that man is dishonest. To him is where these reports ought to have been sent in the first instance, and not here to a House of 391 men, who have no opportunity to review them. You know that if this matter goes to the President of the United States with the recommendation made by the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], that the matter be inquired into, and that he take such action as the good of the public service requires, that that action will be taken, and every good purpose that can be served by the discussion of this matter will have been served. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON] has expired.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] is a happy solution of this question. [Applause on the Democratic side.] What is the proposition now pending? The resolution proposes to approve the findings of fact as made by one of the standing committees of this House, a dignified, able body of gentlemen.

In addition to the approval of these findings of fact by a majority of one of our standing committees, one of the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle [Mr. DAVIS], a Republican from Minnesota, also concurs in them. This side of the House can not afford, nor can gentlemen who believe as they believe, say that this committee has made a false finding of facts, and send it out to the country that you have turned them down, and this House will not do it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But gentlemen say you are trying this man in his absence. You are not doing it. We propose to take the facts brought to this body and submit them to the President of the United States, and he can take the evidence and he can take additional evidence and summon this man from the other side of the world if he sees proper and give him a hearing, and if he is not guilty the Chief Executive can acquit him. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But if he is guilty, as practically everybody on this side of the House and many on that side believe, he is not fit to be a public servant of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, gentlemen, let us solve it in this way. We do not by this resolution indorse the arguments made by these gentlemen. We do not indorse any immaterial suggestions they have made, but after they have labored for days and weeks and have brought us the fruits of their labor and have said, "Here is something upon which we desire the judgment of the House and of the country," we can not afford to let it go out to the people of the United States that one of the committees of this House has spoken falsely in regard to such a case. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It would be a fortunate solution for some of the gentlemen on the other side if you should stamp the report of the majority of the committee as a falsehood, an injurious and unjust attack. It would be a sweet morsel to send over this country that the majority of the committee had been turned down, that we had slapped them in the face, and the President of the United States had echoed these slanderous statements expressed in the "views of the minority," and thus insult one of the committees of this House. For one I am not willing to go home to my people, and do not believe there is any Representative of the American people here who can afford to go to his people and say that he failed to frown down fraud and corruption in the service wherever it was brought to his attention on the floors of the American Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, upon a question of this character I can not accept the opinion or the judgment of any committee or of any individual, but I must act upon my own unbiased judgment. [Applause.]

For that reason I have taken the time not only to examine as much of the evidence as possible, but I have given close attention to the discussion that has taken place here. We are asked to indorse as a fact the finding that one Michael is guilty of the crime of larceny. The record shows that Secretary Knox, on the 20th of May, cabled to Michael at Calcutta that in an investigation by one of the committees of the House it was disclosed that a certain voucher, purporting to be a voucher to pay for a portrait of the late Secretary Day, disclosed the payment of a much larger sum than was actually paid, and asking for a full report. The cablegram as it appears in the record is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 20, 1911.

AMERICAN CONSUL, Calcutta:

Testimony before the House Committee on Expenditures is to the effect that while you were chief clerk one Albert Rosenthal received your personal check for $850, the actual amount of his bill for portrait Secretary Day, while voucher signed in blank by Rosenthal indicates payment of $2,450. Mail immediately full report of the facts and of the disposition of the remainder of the amount of the voucher. Cable substance of report.

KNOX.

Michael replied, according to Secretary Knox, that he had made a full report of this matter in 1905, and that he knew nothing additional thereto.

If it be accepted that Michael told the truth in 1905, his letter is a complete explanation of what happened to the money. [Applause.]

I am not satisfied with a great many things connected with this case, and there appear to have existed conditions which should not be tolerated in the public service; but if Michael's statement be true it shows what happened to the money as far as he could explain.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish the gentleman would let me complete this statement, because I hope some one will correct my impression if it be wrong. I understand the committee rejects Michael's statement and characterizes it as false in one particular, and therefore assert that it must be false in every particular, and contend that he actually took the money himself because one Rosenthal testifies that Michael made certain statements to him about the payment of the money which are inconsistent with the written explanation of Michael.

Michael's statement appears in the RECORD of August 4, 1911, and is as follows:

CALCUTTA, INDIA, May 7, 1911.

Hon. ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Your letter of the 28th of March was received in last Sunday's mail—the last mail from the United States—and my answer thereto goes forward by the first outward mail.

You call my attention to a "voucher bearing No. 228, unaccompanied by a bill or other memoranda, for the sum of $2,450 * * * for expenses incurred and to be paid out of the emergency fund appropriated for 1903, under which is written in ink in parentheses (for portrait of Judge Day, late Secretary of State), * * * duly signed by Albert Rosenthal, dated January 18, 1904.

"As this amount is greatly in excess of the sum paid by the department for other similar portraits, and as it also seems in excess of the figure which this artist is accustomed to receive for his work, the department would be forced to the conclusion that the voucher signed by Rosenthal was actually made out to cover a number of emergency payments, of which the portrait was only one, were it not that the voucher was signed by Rosenthal alone.

"You are requested to state, as far as you can from memory, exactly what was paid for the portrait in question, how it was paid, whether by cash or otherwise, and to indicate what other expenditures, if any, are included in the gross sum of the voucher, and any other explanatory facts within your knowledge."

In reply I have the honor to say that the price paid for the portrait, as nearly as I can now recall, was $750. Whether this includes the cost of the frame, I am unable to say.

My memory is not clear as to how payment was made. I am inclined to think, however, by drafts.

The price paid for the portrait was, I believe, agreed upon between ex-Secretary of State Day and Mr. Rosenthal. I was directed by Secretary Hay to write to Judge Day and ascertain whether the portrait was entirely satisfactory to him and the price agreed upon. In reply to my letter Judge Day said the portrait was satisfactory to him, and stated the price to be paid. This letter I handed to Secretary Hay. He took a memorandum out of his portfolio and, after looking at it, directed me to make out a voucher for a certain amount—I do not now recall the amount—to pay for the portrait, and to hand him the balance, which he desired to apply on other emergency accounts. He did not say what the accounts were, and the only impression I got was that they related in some way to Mr. Rockhill in connection with Chinese affairs.

The amount of the voucher—whatever it was—was delivered to me by some one from the Bureau of Accounts, according to my recollection. The price of the portrait was taken out of the envelope containing the money in the presence of Secretary Hay, who retained the balance.

The voucher was to be signed by me, and not Mr. Rosenthal. If he signed the voucher instead of a receipt it was through error. There was no such purpose. If the voucher was sent to him to sign it was by inadvertence; and it seems to me unaccountable that he should have signed such a voucher if it had been sent to him. He was paid in full for the portrait, I am quite sure.

Whatever was done in the premises was done by direction of Secretary Hay, as nothing could have been done otherwise; and if there is anything in the transaction open to criticism it is the error of sending to the artist a voucher which was not intended for his signature at all and which he should not have signed.

With respect, I have the honor to be,
Your most obedient servant,

WM. H. MICHAEL.

It can not be said that on its face this statement is palpably false, or that it may not without some evidence to overcome it, either direct or circumstantial, accurately account for the $1,600, the amount of the discrepancy between the payment for the Day portrait and frame and the face of the voucher. Moreover, when the cable of Secretary Knox is examined it is clear that Michael's statement is responsive to it, and nothing else.

Rosenthal, it appears, testified to certain statements alleged to have been made to him by Michael which are inconsistent with Michael's written statement and upon which the committee relies to characterize Michael's explanation as false and to base its finding that he appropriated the money to himself.

So far as I am aware, Michael has no knowledge of this statement that has been made by Rosenthal as to what Michael said to him. It has not been called to his attention. He has never been confronted with the testimony upon which reliance is placed to discredit and convict him.

Mr. Speaker, without reflecting upon this committee, which I believe have honestly endeavored to make a fair and impartial investigation, and without in any way approving the views submitted by the minority, I can not bring myself by my vote to characterize as a thief a man whose testimony, plausible on its face, and which, if true, explains the transaction, is to be found guilty not only of lying but of larceny, because his statement is inconsistent with statements which he is charged to have made and which never have been brought to his attention. [Applause.]

That is what I believe has been disclosed in this discussion. If I be mistaken, I hope somebody will correct the statement.

It will not do to say in a matter of this character that the Secretary of State should have brought Michael here. I have not heard any statement that the committee requested that he be brought here. Entertaining the views I do of fair dealing, I would not convict the humblest and most undeserving individual without giving the individual charged with an offense at least an opportunity to know the testimony upon which he is to be convicted. I do not wish in any way to reflect on the committee. What the facts are is to be determined from the evidence. It is a question of judgment, and I propose to form my own opinion, form it honestly, and vote in accordance therewith. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, this question presents to the House of Representatives a very serious charge against one of the great departments of the Government. The people of the United States have the right to have their public business honestly administered. [Applause.] I do not approach this question from a partisan standpoint. It is a question that should rise above partisanship, but the entire history of this House bears me out in the assertion that the House of Representatives, as the guardian of the Public Treasury, has always exercised the right to investigate, not only the expenditures of public money, but the question as to whether the executive officers have honestly performed the duties incumbent upon them. This resolution, as offered by the gentleman from Missouri, does not ask this House to sustain the conclusions of the committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman said it did.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understood the gentleman's resolution to state that we approve of the findings of fact but not the conclusion.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I prefer not to yield.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman ought to yield for a simple question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have only five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama declines to yield.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The resolution states that we approve of the findings of facts. Now, you may come to one conclusion in reference to the findings of these facts, I may come to another, the committee may come to another, and the President of the United States may come to another. But there is one material finding of fact in this resolution that has not been denied, and the opportunity for its denial has been presented to the man who is defended in this case.

It was charged in public testimony as far back as last May, by a witness whose credibility and honesty has not been questioned, that when he called on this Mr. Michael for the money—not for what the voucher called for, but for much less than the voucher called for—which Mr. Michael had agreed to pay to him, Mr. Michael stated to him that the money was not available; and yet, Mr. Chairman, the evidence before this House shows that the money was available at that time. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Nearly three months ago the charge was proclaimed before this committee and spread broadcast over the land. Michael undoubtedly, if he has a friend in the world, if the State Department desires to defend itself and can defend itself on that proposition, has known for weeks and months that this man Rosenthal has made this charge, and in no way has he attempted to deny the proposition before this committee and before the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the rule adopted on yesterday be so further modified as to permit him to speak for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida objects. Under the order previously adopted the previous question is ordered. The vote will first be taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], which the Clerk will report.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire at the proper time to move to recommit this resolution to the committee with instructions.

The SPEAKER. The time has not yet arrived for that. The Clerk will report the Lenroot amendment.

The Clerk reported as follows:

Amend House resolution 246 by striking out the words "concurred in and adopted" and insert in lieu thereof the words "transmitted to the President of the United States, together with the minority views and the testimony taken by said committee relating thereto."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 127, nays 136, answered "present" 10, not voting 113, as follows:

For the session:
Mr. LEVER with Mr. SULLOWAY.
Mr. MAHER with Mr. CALDER.
Mr. RAINEY with Mr. HOWELL.
Mr. RIORDAN with Mr. ANDRUS.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, on this resolution I voted "aye." I have a general pair with Mr. BARTLETT, and I will be compelled to withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER. Call the gentleman's name.

The name of Mr. BUTLER was called, and he answered "Present."

The SPEAKER. On the Lenroot amendment the vote is—yeas 127, nays 125, present 8. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a recapitulation. The vote is so close I think we ought to have a recapitulation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks for a recapitulation of the vote.

The vote was recapitulated.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "resolve" and insert "that the findings of fact as contained in Report No. 59 be approved and submitted to the President, with the recommendation that he take appropriate action touching the same."

The question was taken; and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Clerk proceeded with the calling of the roll.

During the roll call the following proceedings occurred:

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not interrupt a roll call. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the roll call.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, just a moment. I would like to ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not interrupt a roll call under the rules. The regular order is the roll call.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for permission that the roll call may be interrupted for a moment in order that I may address the House.

The SPEAKER. The House can do anything by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. It is in reference to the last roll call.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask that the House be in order, so that the Chair can hear the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. It is in reference to the last roll call. Have I permission to interrupt the roll call? I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I object. [Cries of "Oh, no!"] I did not understand the gentleman's question. Therefore I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am informed that a verification of the roll by the officials who verify it after the roll is called discloses that there was a mistake made in the number of names, or something of that sort; so that, in fact, the amendment that was just declared carried by the roll call appears to have been defeated. That is my information. If that be the case, of course it might well be corrected at this time by the announcement of the Chair, and after the vacation of the present roll call the roll call will undoubtedly proceed again.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make a motion?

Mr. MANN. I ask for information. I would like to know whether the Chair is now informed what is the correct vote on the last roll call?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the tally clerk there was a mistake made of 11 in adding up, and that the vote ought to have been announced 127 and 136 instead of 127 and 125.

Mr. MANN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to vacate all proceedings under the present roll call, all proceedings which have been had since the commencement on the previous roll call, and that the Speaker may make a correction of the previous roll call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that proceedings under the present roll call be vacated and all the proceedings under the prior roll call up to the time the Chair announced the vote, and that the Chair shall be permitted to announce the correct totals. Is there objection?

Mr. HINDS. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the Speaker if the other amendment, on which the other roll call was taken, was the amendment to the original resolution reported from the committee?

The SPEAKER. The vote was taken on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] to the original resolution. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. On the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] the vote is yeas 127, nays 136. So the amendment is rejected.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will a motion to recommit the resolution of the gentleman from Missouri be now in order?

The SPEAKER. Not now.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I wish to make a motion to recommit, I will say, Mr. Speaker, at the proper time.

The SPEAKER. The proper time is just before the final passage of the resolution.

The question now recurs on adopting the substitute of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN].

Mr. MANN. And upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have already been ordered. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the request for the yeas and nays on that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws his request for the yeas and nays. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN].

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that by unanimous consent the proceedings in which the roll call was ordered were vacated, and therefore it ought to be called for again.

The SPEAKER. They were vacated up to the place where the roll was called. There was no mistake about calling the roll. The mistake that was made was an arithmetical mistake in adding it up.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Everything was expunged, as I understand, up to the place where the mistake was made, which included the action of calling the roll?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HAMLIN. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RANDELL] calls for the yeas and nays on the Hamlin substitute.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I withdraw my request, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAKER. After the yeas and nays are ordered, can the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his call for it?

The SPEAKER. It was done by unanimous consent. The question is on the Hamlin substitute to the original resolution.

The question was taken, and the Hamlin substitute was adopted.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the resolution as amended by the adoption of the Hamlin substitute.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a motion to recommit.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a motion to recommit the resolution to the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut, who led the fight against this resolution is, I think, entitled to make the motion to recommit.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the Chair said he would recognize me at the proper time to make this motion—to make a motion to recommit the resolution to the committee.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Has the gentleman from Connecticut made a motion to recommit the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut waives his right.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Did he withdraw it?

Mr. TILSON. No; I did not. I made the motion to recommit, and then I yielded to the gentleman from Colorado.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut to recommit.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Colorado. I will withdraw my motion, and yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the resolution to the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] moves——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think we are entitled to make the motion to recommit from our side if we desire.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks undoubtedly the spirit of the rule is that the opposition——

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California will wait until the Chair states the situation. The Chair is of the opinion that the spirit of the rule is that the leader on the side of opposition to a particular measure has the right to make the motion to recommit, and his side itself has that preference. The Chair offered to recognize the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] to make the motion to recommit, but the gentleman from Connecticut waived his right and asked the Chair to recognize the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that he made the motion and can not withdraw it without unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Any motion in the House can be withdrawn before action is taken. [Cries of "Regular order!" "Regular order!"]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. How did the gentleman from Colorado vote on the Lenroot amendment?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I voted against it, and I also voted against the other proposition.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will permit the Chair to state his understanding of this rule, the Chair will state that the spirit of the rule is that the opposition to a measure has the right to make the motion to recommit with instructions, and preferably the leader of the opposition has the right to make that motion.

Mr. HINDS. Will the Chair permit a suggestion?

The SPEAKER. In a moment. If there is nobody opposed to it who wants to make it, the Chair would recognize somebody on this side to make it. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] was recognized. He made the motion and then withdrew it, and then asked that the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] be recognized.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman from Colorado recognized?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado is already recognized.

Mr. HINDS. I do not wish to antagonize the ruling, which seems fair, but I was going to suggest, and perhaps I might suggest now for the consideration of the Speaker, whether the requirement to recognize one in opposition applies to a case of a simple resolution. The rule was careful to specify that that condition should apply to a motion to recommit a bill or joint resolution, apparently intending by that language to exclude everything else. I merely make that suggestion. I had it in mind when I thought the Chair might rule the other way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman and to the House that this question has been raised privately several times to-day, and the only authority that the Chair has found up to the present time is that on a resolution in a contested-election case, which was a House resolution, Mr. Speaker Crisp held that the word "bill" as used in that connection was a generic term and related to resolutions.

Mr. HINDS. Not to detain the Chair for a mere academic question, I would call his attention to the fact that the framers of this rule did not leave the word "bill" and the definitions inhering to it in the rule, but they went beyond it and said "bill or joint resolution," thereby intending to confine it to bills and joint resolutions.

Mr. MANN. The Chair is fair about it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That House resolution 246 be recommitted to the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, with instructions to procure the attendance and testimony of the said W. H. Michael before said committee, touching upon the matters and things with which he is charged, in connection with the investigation herein pending, and that the committee make further report thereon.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas, 132, nays 136 answered "present" 6, not voting 112, as follows:

So the resolution was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. HAMLIN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT.

Then, on motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m., the House adjourned until Monday, August 7, 1911, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor submitting a deficiency estimate for an appropriation for completing the Thirteenth Decennial Census of the United States (H. Doc. No. 98), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 3069) to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the drainage of certain lands in the State of Minnesota," approved May 20, 1908, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 124), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CARTER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution of the House (H. J. Res. 141) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to make a per capita payment to the enrolled members of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, and Seminole Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes entitled to share in the funds of said tribes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 125), which said resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SLAYDEN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 13120) to transfer a portion of Fort Clark Military Reservation to the State of Texas for a tuberculosis sanitarium, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 126), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10652) to authorize the counties of Yell and Conway to construct a bridge across the Petit Jean River, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 123), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the joint resolution of the House (H. J. Res. 142) to declare and make certain the authority of the Attorney General to begin and maintain and of the circuit court to entertain and decide a suit or suits for the purpose of having judicially declared a forfeiture of the rights granted by the act entitled "An act granting to the Washington Improvement & Development Co. a right of way through the Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington," approved June 4, 1898, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 122), which said resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were thereupon referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13134) granting a pension to Woodson O. Angel; Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 8719) granting an increase of pension to Michael J. Meehan; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

SENATE.

MONDAY, August 7, 1911.

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 2983) for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Thirteenth Census, which had heretofore been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a memorial of District Grand Lodge, No. 2, Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, of Cincinnati, Ohio, remonstrating against the treatment accorded American citizens in Russia, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Hartford, Kans., remonstrating against the establishment of a rural parcels-post system, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WETMORE presented a petition of the Rhode Island Quarterly Meeting of Friends, praying for the ratification of the proposed treaties of arbitration between the United States, Great Britain, and France, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CRANE (for Mr. LODGE) presented a petition of the Press Association of the State of Massachusetts and a petition of the Rhode Island Society of Friends, praying for the ratification of the proposed treaties of arbitration between the United States, Great Britain, and France, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PERKINS presented petitions of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, the Commercial Club of Santa Barbara, the Chamber of Commerce of Sacramento, the Humboldt Chamber of Commerce of Eureka, the Chamber of Commerce of Riverside, the Chamber of Commerce of Oakland, the Board of Trade of Pasadena, and the Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles, all in the State of California, and of the World Peace Foundation and the Business Men's Association of Salem, N. J., praying for the ratification of the proposed treaties of arbitration between the United States, Great Britain, and France, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ROOT presented 100 petitions of citizens of Brooklyn, N. Y., and 88 petitions of citizens of New York City, N. Y., praying for the repeal of the duty on lemons, which were ordered to lie on the table.

RECLAMATION OF THE EVERGLADES OF FLORIDA.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 130, S. Doc. 89), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed as a public document, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, a compilation of acts, reports, and other papers, State and national, relating to the reclamation of the Everglades of the State of Florida, with accompanying illustrations.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. DILLINGHAM:

A bill (S. 3175) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States; to the Committee on Immigration.

By Mr. RAYNER:

A bill (S. 3176) granting a pension to Carolyn V. Maucha (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CLARK of Wyoming:

A bill (S. 3177) granting an increase of pension to Felix Defiin (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate, under the order heretofore made, House joint resolution 14.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 14) to admit the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona as States into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. NELSON. I offered to the joint resolution an amendment in the form of a substitute. I now wish to modify the substitute. On page 3, line 4, after the first word "That," strike out the words "within 30 days" and insert "immediately." I offer it in that form, so that it will read:

That immediately after the passage of this resolution, etc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota modifies his amendment. The modification will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 4, strike out, after the word "That," the words "within 30 days" and insert in lieu the word "immediately," so as to read:

That immediately after the passage of this resolution and its approval by the President the President shall certify the fact to the governor of Arizona, etc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The substitute will be so modified. The substitute has already been read to the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. I shall later on ask leave to address the Senate on the subject of the substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] as a substitute.

Mr. BRISTOW. As I understand it, the question is on an amendment to the substitute, which the Senator from Minnesota has offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the question is on agreeing to the amendment. The Senator from Minnesota has a right to modify it, the substitute not having been acted upon. He has simply made a modification.

Mr. STONE. May I inquire if it is the so-called Nelson amendment which is now before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Nelson amendment is now before the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. And I modified my own amendment by striking out the words "within 30 days" and inserting "immediately," which I had a right to do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly. The Secretary will again state the modification.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Cullom	Myers	Smoot
Borah	Dillingham	Nelson	Stephenson
Brandegee	Foster	O'Gorman	Stone
Bristow	Gamble	Overman	Swanson
Brown	Gronna	Owen	Taylor
Bryan	Guggenheim	Page	Thornton
Burnham	Heyburn	Perkins	Warren
Chamberlain	Johnson, Me.	Poindexter	Watson
Chilton	Kern	Reed	Wetmore
Clapp	Lippitt	Richardson	Williams
Crane	Martin, Va.	Root	Works
Crawford	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Mich.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understand that the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] is ready to proceed, and I hope he will do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota had the floor when the question of a quorum was raised. If the Senator from Minnesota does not desire to hold it——

Mr. NELSON. I simply stated that I would later on have something to say in respect to my substitute; not at this time, but later.

CORRECTIONS IN APPROPRIATION ACTS.

Mr. WARREN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 1) to correct errors in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2 and 3.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate amending the title of the joint resolution, and agree to the same.

F. E. WARREN,
GEO. C. PERKINS,
MURPHY J. FOSTER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
A. S. BURLESON,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I understand that this report presents what is intended to be a final disposition of the joint resolution in conference. I notice that the conferees of the Senate have receded from amendment No. 2 relating to the funds of the University of Idaho; I have been more jealous of the action of Congress and of the conference committee in regard to this item than I would have felt justified in being were it a personal matter or one other than affecting the educational fund. I desire before action is taken upon the conference report to state very briefly my position so that the RECORD will always make plain the fact and the reason.

Under the general law of the United States there is paid by the General Government to the universities of the States a certain percentage of the money received from the sale of public lands.

Mr. WARREN. Five per cent.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is 5 per cent. That piece of legislation works out automatically as a rule. The accounts are made up in the department, and, the amount being found due, the Government sends a draft or the Government's check to the treasurer of the educational institution, in this case the University of the State of Idaho. The Government, pursuant to its custom, did send a check or draft, and it never reached its destination. It was not registered. No special pains were taken that it should be considered other than ordinary mail in transmission. The Government was notified by the university of the failure of the receipt of its check, whereupon the Government refused to take any further notice of the question unless the State or the university should give a bond in a large amount, far in excess of the amount of the check lost.

The university could not give a personal bond nor could it, under any existing conditions or law, secure an individual bond. It was compelled to go to a bonding agency and pay $500, the regular fee, for that surety bond. There was no fault on the part of the State or of the university; if there was a fault, it was on the part of the Government, or those acting for it. There should have been no bond required, because the Government could have protected itself against a second payment by refusing to honor a lost draft. There is no rule better established in commercial life than that the Government stood to lose nothing; it could only pay the one draft. Notwithstanding that fact, the university needing this fund as a part of the national fund that is relied upon and required for the maintenance of the institution, after much interchange of correspondence, the State did pay the $500 to a surety company to give this bond. The State merely asks that this fund be reimbursed, because a hole in a fund of that kind could not be stopped by any State action. We have no authority to divert money from some other fund to recoup that fund; so it should have been made good to the Government. That is obvious; and why any committee, or why any legislative body, should hesitate for a moment about it has always been a mystery to me.

I have stated these facts on every occasion where an explanation was due. It was a case of such obvious injustice that I have never thought for a moment that a conference committee of the two Houses would hold out, as they have for months, against allowing that to go in the urgent deficiency bill, where it properly belongs.

I am not willing, even in so righteous a cause, to tie up or long delay legislation where great interests of the Government are at stake. It is represented that by insisting upon this provision remaining in the urgent deficiency bill I am causing delay in the adjustment of the Treasury balances relative to the construction of our battleships, and that the provision which was made authorizing a payment in excess of 90 per cent—in other words, a payment to the extent of the finished or constructed work—is in jeopardy. If I yield in this matter—and I want the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to be thoroughly advised—it will be because this measure comes in as a repeal, and not under the guise of correcting the records of a previous Congress. I would not, as a man who claims to be learned in the law, stand here and permit one Congress to attempt a correction of the Journals of a previous Congress. That is not within our power, and any claim that we are doing that, as is recited in the preamble of this joint resolution, would cause me, without regard to the merit of the measure, to stand here as long as I might under the rules of this body to resist it. If we ever open that door, then one Congress may, by merely correcting the Journal of another Congress, add to or detract from its action. I can not conceive of that being done. I think it should appear to every lawyer and every layman of this body that such a thing would be dangerous in the extreme; but with the understanding had with the chairman of the committee, that the title of this measure will be amended so as not to recite that it is for the purpose of correcting errors, I will yield, but on no other consideration. I will yield with the understanding that this $500 which the Government owes the State of Idaho shall be taken care of in the appropriate appropriation bill at the regular session of the Senate.

I feel quite justified in taking time enough of the Senate this morning to make this matter plain, both in regard to the principle of correcting the Journals of a previous Congress and in regard to the justice of this claim of the State of Idaho against the Government. So I do not feel in an apologetic frame of mind at all. I am sure that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who is chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and has direct charge of this matter, will agree with me in stating the understanding, first, in regard to the change to be made in the title of the joint resolution—that is a condition precedent to my yielding anything—and, second, that this item of $500 shall be taken care of, so far as it is possible for any Member of this body to promise, in the regular and appropriate appropriation bill at the coming Congress.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator from Idaho for yielding his objections. The title of the joint resolution is changed by an amendment which has been accepted, so that it now reads "A joint resolution to amend certain appropriations acts, approved March 4, 1911."

I sympathize with the Senator in the matter of the Idaho University. There seems to have been wrong done by somebody. It seems to me that a second check or draft might have been issued, stating that it was a duplicate; and the first, the original, being unpaid, the duplicate should be paid, and so forth, instead of mulcting the State of Idaho for $500.

I propose, so far as I am individually concerned, to assist the Senator in any way I can at the proper time, under the rules, to obtain relief for his State. Of course, I can promise nothing as to what may come in the appropriation bills, because that is a matter for the Senate to settle as to the Senate side, the House of Representatives to settle on the other side, and for the conferees on the part of the two Houses to settle finally as to both sides; but I am thoroughly in sympathy with the Senator in the claim for his State, and shall cooperate, so far as I can, with the Senator in some proper way to obtain the relief that is sought.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

S. 1149. An act permitting the Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie Railway Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge across the St. Croix River between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota;

S. 2732. An act to authorize the Providence, Warren & Bristol Railroad Co. and its lessee, the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., or either of them, to construct a bridge across the Palmers or Warren River, in the State of Rhode Island; and

S. 2768. An act to authorize the St. Louis-Kansas City Electric Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the town of Weldon Springs Landing, Mo.

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 14) to admit the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona as States into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I take it that the paramount question involved in the pending joint resolution, and particularly in the amendment to the joint resolution, as reported by the committee, which has been offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], is the question of whether or not the people of a proposed State of this Union shall have the right of self-government in their local affairs and shall be admitted to the Union, if they are admitted, upon an equal footing with every other State in the Union. I regard that question as paramount to any consideration of the merits of the proposed local laws of Arizona, whether or not they shall have direct legislation in their State affairs or shall not have it, and the manner in which they shall choose or remove their public officials in their local State affairs.

It has been said by a distinguished Senator that the Senate and Congress are particularly interested in this joint resolution because it involves the participation of a State in the government of the United States through the representation of the State in Congress. I submit, Mr. President, that the only concern that the Congress of the United States legitimately has in that question is that the State, when it is admitted to the Union, shall conform itself to the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance of that instrument, including as a part of that general obligation the sending of Senators and Representatives to represent the State in the Congress. I submit, sir, that when that question has been determined the interest and the legitimate concern of the United States or of Congress in the form of the laws of Arizona comes to an end. There is no more important principle involved in the Constitution of the United States than that the activities and concern of the Nation should come to an end at that point in its interference with the action of States. The arguments turning upon that question——

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I want to inquire of the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I want to inquire of the Senator whether he prefers to proceed with his argument or whether he would object, as he goes along from time to time, to such questions as might be pertinent?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have no objection to interruption for the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, in connection with the last statement of the Senator from Washington, I would suggest that the Constitution upon which he relies especially provides that, after a State has rendered its verdict, Congress shall be the sole judge of the qualifications of its own Members.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is a part of the principle which I have just stated. I do not take issue with the Senator from Idaho upon that proposition; but that question is not involved here. There is not any question whatever before this Congress at this time as to the qualifications of any Senator or any Representative in Congress from the proposed State of Arizona, and that suggestion has nothing whatever to do with any question now before Congress.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington further yield?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. It would not have been pertinent except for the statement of the Senator that when a State had sent its representatives to Congress that was the end of it. I merely intended to point to the fact that it was not the end of it; that it was only the beginning of the test of the qualifications and of the right to sit in Congress.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I did not confine my statement to the function stated by the Senator from Idaho, but I said that the proposed State should conform itself to the Constitution. The particular provision to which the Senator now refers is a part of the constitution and included within the legitimate activities of Congress, but it is entirely aside from any question now before this body.

The arguments, Mr. President, that are being leveled against the constitution of Arizona all resolve themselves, when digested and analyzed—and I am more and more convinced of this upon reading the speeches that have been made here in opposition to this joint resolution—into the proposition that the people can not be trusted with power; that the people are not competent to make laws for their own government; to choose and depose their own officials. The arguments are but the repetition of the arguments that were made against the Declaration of Independence of this country, and the Constitution about which the Senator talks and under which we are now living. They are the same arguments that were interposed against every advance in the development of that system of free laws and free government under which we are living now. Read the history of England and you can read almost word for word the arguments that are simply being repeated here as to the dangers and pitfalls lying in the path of giving the people power over their affairs. They reduce themselves to the logical proposition that the fewer people that are vested with a voice in the Government the better it is, and the less power they have the better it is in a system of government. That is the argument, and that is all there is to the argument.

The people of Arizona, assembled in convention for the purpose of adopting a fundamental law for the government of the new State, adopted this preamble:

> We, the people of the State of Arizona, grateful to Almighty God for our liberties, do ordain this constitution.

They expressed their joy—and no doubt it was not a mere formal expression, but evidenced their sincere satisfaction and joy—at the prospect, after 20 years of agitation and struggle, of admission into the sisterhood of States, that at last the opportunity had come for self-government; and they expressed their gratitude for the privilege of themselves adopting a system of law for the government of their local affairs. Is Congress to make a mere travesty of that solemn expression on the part of the constitutional convention representing the people of Arizona? Is their expression of gratitude for their liberties and the privilege of adopting a self-governing constitution to be a mere irony and mockery? Are we to make it a mere piece of irony and a travesty upon the facts by denying them admission into the Union until they adopt a constitution not satisfactory to the people of Arizona, but a constitution that meets the judgment, the wishes, and the views of people who do not live in Arizona, who have no concern and no interest in the affairs of Arizona so far as those affairs are local, and no concern with the administration of their local laws? Are we to establish the principle in this country that self-government, the right of the States under the Federal Union to control their own affairs, is a mistaken policy? Are we going to depart from well-settled precedent in that regard? Are Senators who are so enamored of the Constitution as it was originally formed any less enamored of that feature of the Constitution than they are of the other features of it? I take it that there is no more important principle in the Constitution than that vital one which preserves the right of local self-government, and that is the question which is involved, and the most important question that is involved, in this joint resolution.

As to the particular provisions of the constitution of Arizona, there are only a few of them which are particularly objected to. The effect of the primary election laws, the recall, the initiative, and the referendum, as has often been stated, is not to abolish any of the present organs of government, but the purpose is to increase the responsibility of these agencies to the people, and by doing so, by increasing the responsibility of those departments of the government which are already established in the States and in the United States, to secure that good administration which Senators say is the cure for all of our political evils. The purpose of these new provisions is to secure good administration, good execution of the laws on the part of the officials who have been chosen under the present system, not to abolish those offices, not to abolish those departments of the government, but it is to make them responsible to the people and bring to bear upon them a motive for executing their offices faithfully and justly, and for doing that which the Senator held up as that in which they are most lacking, and as the cure for whatever political evils may exist at the present time in this country.

The difficulty with our present system is not that the people have not the power to prevent the passage of laws; they have that power in the most marked degree; but the difficulty is that the people have not the power to enact laws. The one power is just as essential as the other in any system of popular government. There are plenty of checks, but there is not enough motive power. There is ample negative weight, but there is not enough affirmative force. A small minority can absolutely prevent the enactment of statutes desired by the majority, and a still smaller minority can prevent any change in the constitution.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would suggest to the Senator that the provision contained in the proposed constitution expressly authorizes 25 per cent of the people to do that which the Senator complains may be done by a mere minority.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Idaho has spoken on this question a number of times, and no doubt has familiarized himself with the facts in the case, and that being so, I am very much surprised to hear him make that statement, because he is mistaken. There is no such provision in the proposed constitution.

I was very much surprised a few days ago to hear the Senator from Idaho make the positive statement. It so happened that, in reply to a question that had been asked me by some one who lived in a distant part of the country, whether or not a petition for the recall of an official—which is that provision which the Senator is referring to—when it was filed had the effect of deposing the official from office, I had just stated that it did not. Immediately afterwards I heard the Senator from Idaho, upon the floor, in serious debate, repeatedly make the statement that it did have that effect, and now I understand he is repeating it here. There is not a word in the proposed constitution of Arizona that provides for any such thing, not a word.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington further yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield further.

Mr. HEYBURN. The point I made at that time and that I am now making is that 25 per cent of the people filing a protest or a demand for the removal of the officer puts him at once upon his defense and forces him into a campaign that can not last more than 30 days and may be determined in 20. In other words, it takes him from the performance of his duty as a legislator and compels him to enter into a contest to defend himself.

I made the point that if you would file petitions for withdrawal against enough members you could send them all into the political campaign at once, in order to determine whether or not at the end of 20 days they should continue to be members of the legislature, and thus you would destroy the vitality and effective power of the legislature.

Now, I have not attempted to present this more than meagerly and briefly; but because the Senator has challenged that which I said on a former occasion, I desire, with his permission and courtesy, to make it so plain now that I will not hereafter be subject to a charge of having said that it was complete upon the filing. I said the effect of it, of the filing, was as complete as it would be at the end of 20 days, within which the matter may be decided. Now do I make myself plain to the Senator?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Perfectly so. I am perfectly willing to yield for a question, but——

Mr. HEYBURN. I would not have intruded upon the Senator's time except for the fact that he made a statement as to what I had said on a former occasion. I understand the Senator is entitled to express himself in his own time. I merely expressed the idea that you could send a majority of the members of the legislature away from the performance of their duties into the field of contention as to whether or not they should remain there. Now, I will not interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is not the question we have been discussing at all. It is an entirely different one, Mr. President. The statement which was made by the Senator from Idaho appears in the RECORD. I will not take the time now to send for the RECORD and to read the statement, but I think the Senator on reading it will find that the statement was that the filing of the petition effected the recall. That is a mistake.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator will pardon me. I will not enter into it any more than merely to say—I have not myself looked at the RECORD—that I stated at the time I was only meagerly expressing it, and I do not believe there is any profit in challenging that RECORD, because I said it was a meager presentation of it, and there may be phrases which, if taken alone, would stop there. But I afterwards, and especially on Saturday, went further and explained, not so completely as I have on this occasion, what I meant by the petition working its purpose. It works its purpose when it takes a man out of the performance of his duties and sends him into the field for reelection. That is the effect of it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course it is not essential what the Senator said on some former occasion so much as it is essential what he is saying now. I read the debate between the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE], at which time, when the Senator's attention was called to the language of the constitution, he modified his position. This is the language to which I referred. The Senator from Idaho, as shown by the RECORD of August 5, said:

> Mr. HEYBURN. It requires a majority to elect a man to the legislature, but it only requires 25 per cent of the vote to deprive him of his office.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It requires a majority vote to deprive him of his office after a deliberate, orderly election, held according to the election laws of the State.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was speaking of the effect of it in general terms. I see no reason at all to take it back.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In order that there may be no misunderstanding about it, on the same day the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows the Senator from Idaho to have made this statement:

> The filing of the petition terminates the service of the officer against whom it is filed. No action is required to give it further force.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is in the legislature.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. That is absolutely true; it terminates his service by taking him out—and I explained that at some length—of the legislature and putting him into a campaign. If I should conclude to speak again on the subject, and it is thought necessary, I will elaborate that; but I think I have already made it plain.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think so. So I will not pursue that question further.

Of course, as stated before, there is involved here no question of a modification or an amendment of the Constitution of the United States, but it is assumed that the proposed constitution is a departure generally from that system of government which is provided for under the Constitution. Certain Senators assume—I do not think the Senator from Idaho does, and I have the very greatest respect for his opinions, particularly for his legal opinions, because of my personal knowledge of his distinguished legal career—apparently take the position that while they are perfectly free to suggest amendments to the Constitution of the United States which vitally change the system of government provided for by it, that anybody else who proposes a change of that system of government is a lunatic or a soothsayer or a political prophet or a reformer in the opprobrious sense in which they use that word.

They assume, with the exception of the proposed amendments which they themselves approve of, that every other amendment is an attack upon a holy covenant which ought to be perpetual—an act adopted 124 years ago, under conditions absolutely and entirely different from those that are existing now, by a set of men who were the equals of any equal number of men that ever assembled for a public purpose, and who did a greater work than any other similar body of men ever did, but who were not gifted with the prescience of the ages, could not look centuries ahead and see the conditions that were going to exist and spring up anew throughout the land, bringing about the need for new instruments of government. I imagine that nobody would be more surprised than some of the men who framed the Constitution of the United States to hear the arguments made now that we must not in any respect modify or change the agencies of government provided for at that time.

I think it was Mr. Dooley who said that Thomas Jefferson was a very good man, but that he lived before the days of open plumbing. We can not limit ourselves in the details of governmental agencies absolutely and entirely to those that were provided for when the Constitution was adopted. I do not know of anybody who absolutely proposes that except the Senator from Idaho, and I only infer it to be true in his case.

Mr. HEYBURN. As the Senator has challenged me, I ask that he permit me to inquire just the point of that remark.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The point is simply this: I said there were other Senators who objected to any amendments to the Constitution, except those they themselves approved of, and thought it was a species of political lunacy to propose any others; but they did admit that there were some that would be wise; but that the Senator from Idaho, so far as I am aware, is the only Senator and the only person that I know of who is opposed to any change whatever, and takes the position that it would be in the nature of a political crime to make any change, however slight, in the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit me, I will assist him in formulating an expression of my real position in a few words. It is not that I object to any change in the Constitution merely because somebody proposes it. I object to any amendment to the Constitution that is not of compelling force. Were I participating in the making of a constitution, I would doubtless find much in some of the propositions that would influence me in my action. But the value of a constitution is its stability; the value of a constitution consists in the fact that it can not legitimately be changed by the easy methods of legislation.

Now, I am not perhaps so much of a bourbon as the Senator would picture me, and yet I have no hesitation in saying that to-day presents no problem to my mind that requires any amendment or change in the Constitution of the United States; none whatever. I merely wanted to assist the Senator in drawing a picture of my bourbonism.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very glad to have the Senator's definition of his bourbonism and explanation of his constitutional attitude. I want to modify my statement to this extent, that I did hear the Senator make this apparently reluctant concession: That if a sufficient number of legislatures of the United States directed Congress to call a convention for the purpose of amending the Constitution he would do his duty and vote for carrying out the directions of a sufficient number of the States.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have taken an oath to do that—to obey the Constitution and uphold it and support it—and the Constitution says that when a sufficient number of the States by their legislatures demand the calling of a convention, the Congress shall do so; and I have no hesitation in saying I stand ready to keep that faith.

Mr. POINDEXTER. When the Constitution of the United States was adopted the people were fresh from their experiences with the arbitrary power of the King and Parliament of Great Britain, and their principal idea was to destroy centralized power and so distribute it that no one function or agency of the Government could oppress the people; and they were eminently successful in doing so. Nor to this day have there been serious complaints, except perhaps in the administration of John Adams, of the oppression of the people by the Government. No one is making that complaint to-day.

It is not action, but inaction, that they are complaining of. It is not oppression by the Government that galls and burdens them, but oppression and extortion by great private powers, which have, at first gradually and of late years quite rapidly, appeared and grown to exaggerated influence in the land.

These private monopolies and crude but powerful industrial barons have grasped the opportunities of the minority and of the distribution of power and the separation of the functions of government under our system to delay for a generation, or to finally defeat, the enactment of laws by which they should be regulated and restrained. For the same reason they have been able to thwart a vigorous administration of such laws as were with much toil and tribulation already placed upon the statute books. Through an extraconstitutional system of government by conventions and caucuses, which were wholly a law unto themselves and entirely without restraint of the Constitution or of statute, these private interests have seized by cunning and fraud many public governmenal functions. They have operated these stolen agencies which belong to the people wholly for private aggrandizement, and by this means have established in this country monopolies far greater than those which blighted the enterprises of France upon this continent or sapped and destroyed the vigor of Rome.

They have built up a government within a government—a government of machine organization, machine caucuses, machine conventions, within but distinct from the established system of constitutional legislatures, congresses, executives, and judiciary. In too many instances and for too long periods of time, largely by reason of the lack of affirmative power of the people under the Constitution, the machine system of government has overwhelmed and dominated that provided for by the Constitution. The relation of these two powers is like the governor of France and the intendant of the King in early Canada; like the ideal and ostensible sovereign, representing the dignity and welfare of the people, and the secret and sinister hand of Mme. de Pompadour really directing the affairs of state.

In some of its methods and manifestations this unconstitutional government of private interests is as ominous and secret as the Nihilists, the Camorra, or the Ku-Klux Klan; but it is more powerful than any of them. It has its feudal sovereign and feudal lords dictating the affairs of States and cities, and crowned with as absolute power within their respective principalities as the potentates of the East. This is the condition which has thrived on the ease by which affirmative action by the people can be defeated. To meet its evils gradually—and not suddenly, as claimed by the learned Senator from Utah—the people, with much patience, study, toil, and experiment, have devised certain remedies. Gradually, in many localities, by these means they are destroying the power of the system machine and reclaiming the power of the public. Some of these remedies are included in the constitution of Arizona, and it does not become the Congress of the United States to deny to the people of Arizona the laws they desire and to force upon them, as the price of statehood, a constitution they do not desire.

If this Government fails, it will fail from the evils I have outlined above, and it will never fail from giving into the hands of the people real power to carry out its functions according to their purpose and intent, unless, Mr. President, the day shall come when those people shall be incapable of self-government. Then will be the time to adopt another system of government.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRYAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would like to impose upon the patience of the Senator from Washington for a moment. Is it not true that this constitution is a contract between the people of the State of Arizona and the United States? Is not its real nature that of a contract? These people say to the Government, "If you will admit us into the Union as a State, we will administer our laws upon the principles stated in this contract." Therefore is not the United States a very much interested party in the contents of such a document?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is going into rather an academic discussion, as to whether it is a contract or is not a contract. It is sufficient to say to the people of Arizona that they should be admitted, and admitted subject to the Constitution of the United States and the laws enacted in pursuance thereof, whether it is a contract or not.

Mr. HEYBURN. But they are admitted by virtue of a document now offered. Does the Senator contend that none but the people of the State of Arizona are interested in the contents of this document? Are not all the people of the United States equally interested in it?

Mr. POINDEXTER. All the people of the United States are not equally interested in it. All the people of the States have not an equal right to interfere in it. They have no right at all. Under the system provided for by the Constitution and the principle upon which our Government was founded and has been administered up to the present time, they have no legitimate interest in it; and we have no right when we come to admit a State into the Union to say that the people of Arizona are not as intelligent as those in the Senator's own State, or in my State, or in any other State. The people of Arizona have a right to say what constitution shall govern them in their domestic government, because the Constitution of the United States does not contemplate arbitrary action to the contrary on the part of a great nation. There is a handful of people who have reclaimed a desert and made it habitable for man. They have worked out, through all the difficulties and hardships of early settlement in the wilderness, a system of law for the orderly conduct of their community.

Mr. HEYBURN. If I may further interrupt the Senator, is it not true that the State of Arizona is a geographical proposition primarily; that the territory now within those lines is the property of the people of the United States, and that they are yielding up their jurisdiction over it—that is, the absolute jurisdiction—to the people who are or who may hereafter be within it? Does not that give all the people of the United States some right to pass upon the conditions of this contract—the people who are going to do business in that Territory or the people who live in that Territory and yet are not citizens of it?

Mr. POINDEXTER. To pursue this rather abstract inquiry it gives them the right to do so so long as it remains a Territory; but I understand the proposition to be that we are to admit them as a State.

Mr. HEYBURN. After they are a State.

Mr. POINDEXTER. And you can not admit them properly, as I said a moment ago, except upon an equal basis with every State in the Union.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is it to be upon an equal basis with every other State if we deprive the courts in which the people of the State who have interests must have their rights settled of that stability which marks the character of courts in other States? Is it not to be on an equal footing with other States that outside property holders are entitled to go into the courts of that

State and are entitled to that same condition of stability in those courts that they would find elsewhere? Are we not interested in that question?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Not at all. They have no interest whatever in it, and one reason why they have no interest in it is because, in the remarkable ability of the framers of the Constitution of the United States in providing for every contingency, they have provided for just the contingency mentioned by the Senator from Idaho—that our Federal courts shall have jurisdiction in the State of Arizona in which the people of other States can appear and over which the State and the people of Arizona have no control.

Mr. HEYBURN. But till——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield further to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield further.

Mr. HEYBURN. But still the people must have a right to go into the State of Arizona and do business and have access to any courts which are open to any other citizen. They ought not to be compelled by reason of the character of the court to avoid the courts of the State in which they are permitted under the constitution of Arizona to do business. Otherwise they could not do business on an equal footing with other people.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator seems to have a notion that the people of Arizona are going to initiate deliberately a régime of force—intelligently establishing a system of courts in which they could not get justice.

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. POINDEXTER. And that they are willfully going to establish courts for their own oppression instead of the preservation of their rights. Every citizen of the United States who goes into the State of Arizona has the same right in the State courts in those matters in which the State courts have jurisdiction as, for instance, in the police regulations of the State and the punishment of crime that any citizen of the State of Arizona will have. The Senator seems to think that the people of Arizona are deliberately going to establish a system of courts for their oppression, and tyranny, and wrong, and injustice. I submit that the people of Arizona can be depended upon to establish a system of courts in their own interest, and let every citizen of the United States come into the State of Arizona and look to those courts and depend upon the same justice from those courts as do the people of Arizona in the protection of themselves and their property and their personal rights.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield further?

Mr. HEYBURN. If I may once more interrupt the Senator——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was going to suggest that the nonresident could not initiate or take steps to remove the local judge, while the residents, should they suspect that the local judge might not agree with them in regard to the case, might remove him the day before the trial, and the nonresident would then have to commence over again.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is just a chimera. It is just an imaginary situation which the Senator conjures up out of his great imaginative powers. No citizen of Arizona can remove a judge under this recall provision.

Mr. HEYBURN. Twenty-five per cent of them can.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Twenty-five per cent can not remove him.

Mr. HEYBURN. They can incapacitate him. No judge against whom a petition has been filed can go on with the trial of a case.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is easy enough to imagine difficulties and obstacles. I am not an advocate, Mr. President, of a universal system of recall of the judiciary. While I have no prejudices against it, I am an advocate of allowing every jurisdiction in the United States, every State which is a member of the Union, to exercise its own judgment, and particularly the deliberate will of its own people in regard to that question. I am not proposing it for my State at this time. The people of my State are not proposing it for my State. But if conditions arose in that State, as conditions have arisen in the Territory of Arizona, and in their experience with the judiciary there, which convinced the people that it is necessary to put a more direct control over the judiciary in the hands of the people, I do not consider that there is any particular danger in the way of giving that power into the hands of the people.

I am not suggesting and no one is suggesting, so far as I am aware, the universal application of the recall of judges; but, as I have just said, I have no apprehension that evil will result from placing in the hands of a free and intelligent people power by the ordinary and solemn process of the ballot, by a majority of the people, not alone by petitions signed by 25 per cent, not by the people without discussion, not by a people who "have nothing to think with," as one of our facetious citizens said about a certain convention in the days of 1896, but by a people who do think, who "have something to think with," who have an opportunity to read and means of communication and discussion of the merits of judges and other officials, after full and deliberate discussion—a free and intelligent people, acting by a majority, in the orderly process of the ballot.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield further to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to suggest to the Senator in the nature of a question whether a controverted question upon which the integrity and fitness of a judge should depend could be taken up and discussed and decided within 30 days in a State like Arizona? Suppose the withdrawal was based upon an alleged erroneous decision in one of those great mining contests, some of which I have known to last for more than six months, it would have to be gone over by the people of the State and determined as a basis for their voting as to whether or not the judge was in error. Does that seem to be a conservative method of government?

Mr. POINDEXTER. If such a thing as that actually occurred I would not consider that the people were particularly conservative. But that is another one of the things which does not exist except in the Senator's contemplation, and never will exist. It never will be possible to get even 25 per cent of the people of Arizona to sign a petition for the recall of a judge because of a decision in a mining case, much less to get a majority of them to recall him. They are not going to be exercised by any such matters as that.

I have known of conditions of the judiciary where it would have been possible to get 25 per cent of the people to sign a petition for a recall, but it did not depend upon any decision which the court had rendered. It might have depended upon a series and the general course and tenor of the decisions such a judge had rendered. It might have depended upon some misconduct upon his part, as in a case which is recited in a document which I have in my hand of a judge in the State of Montana. The records of the supreme court of the State show that he was in a state of beastly intoxication during the progress of an important trial over which he was presiding. One instance, even, of that kind might not be sufficient to induce 25 per cent of the people to recall him. It might be that they would be induced by a condition which is also recited in this document of a judge of a supreme court in one of the States of the Union who submitted the opinion of the court, which he had been delegated to prepare, to the counsel of a great corporation, which was one of the parties to the case, for his O. K. and revision before it was promulgated as an opinion of the court.

Such things as that, if they unfortunately exist, would bring about the filing of a petition by 25 per cent of the people for the recall of a particular judge, and not because he decided a case in favor of one party or the other.

I want to say to the Senator from Idaho that if he has grasped the true significance of the American character he knows as well as I know that if there is one thing which would keep a judge upon the bench and would insure the favor and the support of an American population it would be the fact that those people were convinced that he could not be swayed from the righteous course as a judge, either by popular clamor or by the insidious influence of some great party litigant.

This talk about a judge being recalled because he was firm in the line of duty, or about his being kept upon the bench by the people because, on the other hand, he was ready to listen to popular clamor and to decide cases as the mob wanted him to decide them, is the most arrant nonsense and a most unjust reflection upon the intelligence of the great people who have made this Nation. There is not a constituency in the Union, in a Territory or in a State, which would recall a judge because he had established a reputation for fearlessness in deciding cases according to the right and merit of the cases, however his decision might be. I have known of cases in which people were interested in a decision in a certain way and the decision was the other way. The judge had the applause of the people, not because he decided the case one way or the other way, but because the people admired the character of the judge. They are wonderfully good judges of character. I read somewhere the other day that the House of Commons of Great Britain was a wonderfully good judge in estimating the character of its members, and that it soon took a man's measure, and perhaps the same thing is true of the Congress of the United States, but I will tell you a better judge of the character of men, and that is the people of the country. It does not take them long to take the measure of a judge upon the bench. They do not measure it upon this decision or that decision, but they measure it upon his course of conduct and his life. They believe in making but one test of his character: Is he a good judge, who can not be swayed by popular influence or by corruption or by the sinister influence of great litigants? If so, there is no great danger of his ever being recalled. They will welcome him upon the bench and keep him there.

There are too many cases, unfortunately, in this country where there are not good judges upon the bench. I am not in the habit of raking up the unfortunate things which occur here and there, and they are greatly in the minority in the number of our public officials, whether judicial or otherwise. In the discussion of this question, if you decide correctly, you must take notice of the fact, public notice, senatorial notice of the fact, that there are many cases where there are upon the bench, or have been upon the bench, just the kind of judges that Senators who are opposing this constitution say would be developed under a recall system. They say that you would develop judges with their ears to the ground; in other words, judges who would listen to outside influences in deciding cases. The reason this recall was proposed is because of the fact that in Arizona there were judges upon the bench, where there was no recall, who had their ears, not to the ground, perhaps, but who heard the corrupt whispers of some great political machine, combined with great business interests.

Yes; as suggested to me by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], the Southern Pacific Railroad and other interests of that kind. That is far more to be feared if, unfortunately, the people in the first instance should elect to the bench a man whose official actions were to be determined by any such influences, that he would be reached by such interests as the Southern Pacific Railroad, than that he would be reached by the so-called clamor of the people. The right kind of a judge would not be reached by either, any more than he would be reached as to a case pending in his court at the end of his term of four years, as provided in many States, and as is provided in the Arizona constitution, and the election was coming on, any more than he would be influenced in the decision of his cases by the approaching election. I say that if such a judge was influenced by that, of course he would likewise be influenced by a recall, but if in either case he is subject to such influences, he is not a fit man to be upon the bench. You can not devise, with all the wit and ingenuity of man, a system of government which would be a success in the hands of officials of that kind. You have got to presume that there will be men of courage and honesty to enact, execute, and decide the laws of a country in order to make a success of any system. The people of Arizona are now trying to devise a plan not to put temptation in the way of judges, but to remove temptation from them, and to make them responsible to the people.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield for a brief question, Mr. President.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, in a contest after the petition for withdrawal had been filed, would there not be an inclination on the part of those who were charged with having an interest in the decision that was the basis of the withdrawal combining for the purpose of either retaining or expelling the judge?

Mr. POINDEXTER. There would be absolutely no danger of that when the matter is to be submitted to the entire population—no possibility of it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now——

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will allow me, there might be some danger of it, as was suggested by Justice Story when the question was submitted to the Legislature of Massachusetts as to whether the Legislature of Massachusetts should have the right to remove judges upon address without notice, without trial. He suggested that it was dangerous, and he pointed out the manner in which great influences might reach the ears of the legislature of which we have had too many examples since Justice Story uttered that prophecy. He had confidence in the people, and I repeat, as I said a moment ago, that while there might be danger of such influences affecting the legislature, with power to remove without notice it is impossible that they could control the action of the people of the entire judicial district.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have had personal knowledge of the fact that the Senator has had a somewhat extended and honorable career upon the bench, and I will ask Did the Senator ever know in his experience, either at the bar, before going on the bench, or when presiding over the court, of conditions arising out of the trial of cases that in his judgment would seem to indicate or suggest the necessity of such a provision as this?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; I have already mentioned two of them this morning.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not recall them.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I dislike to repeat that history and those instances which are well known. Let me read to the Senator a reference. I read from an address by the Hon. T. J. Walsh, of Helena, Mont., before the Washington State Bar Association at Spokane, Wash., July 28, 1911, in response to the question of the Senator as to whether I had any knowledge of such cases.

Mr. HEYBURN. This is merely an address before the bar?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; it was an address before the bar association, but it is now an address before the Senate of the United States. I am going to read this in answer to the Senator's question. This gentleman had knowledge of what he was speaking, and the bar association was just as appropriate a place as any other to give expression to it. Mr. Walsh says:

The supreme court of my State—

That is, the State of Montana—

granted a new trial in Finlen v. Heinze (28 Mont., 548) because the undisputed evidence showed that the judge who tried the case, while hearing it, being more or less steeped in liquor, trafficked through a lewd adventuress with one of the parties to the action. Some chapters from the recent judicial history of this State might serve as well to illustrate the utility of a system through which could be secured the prompt elimination of a judge whose conduct was such as to excite deserved public reprobation. Had not the erring justice, who fled before the wrath of this association, kindled at the disclosure of his intrusting to counsel for one of the parties in a suit before him, a corporation of great wealth, the preparation of the opinion of the court, voluntarily relinquished his seat, the people of Montana would have had abundant cause to be thankful had they been able to retire him under a recall.

Mr. HEYBURN. The legislature could remove him.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There are 16 States in the Union in which the legislature has the power to remove judges without notice and without trial.

Mr. OWEN. Thirty-two can remove them by act of the legislature.

Mr. CLAPP. Thirty-two States can do so, I think.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very much obliged to the Senators for the correction.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is it not a fact that in a number of those instances it requires a two-thirds vote of the legislature, making the action practically one of impeachment, although not upon the same grounds upon which impeachment would be sustained?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Some of them do not require a two-thirds majority; and when——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is it not so required in the great majority of those States?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is in a majority of them, but not in all of them. In one of them the majority of the legislative body of the State—a mere majority, not two-thirds—had the power of removing judges when the State was admitted into the Federal Union—one of the original thirteen Colonies.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes; in one instance. Now I should like to ask the Senator another question. There does not seem to be any limit in this provision. The Senator has mentioned one or two cases commonly known, in which it seems to me very clear grounds for impeachment existed. I do not know whether or not an attempt to impeach was resorted to, but in the recall as proposed in the constitution of Arizona, and in the recall of judges as it has been advocated on this floor, no cause is to be assigned for the recall. It is to be an absolute exercise of the will of the majority. A judge may be recalled because he is not radical enough. It has been argued on the floor that he ought to be recalled if he is wrong temperamentally, although honest. Does the Senator approve of a recall based upon grounds like those?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not approve of the recall based upon any specific grounds in the statute at all. I do not think the grounds ought to be stated. I think it is a matter absolutely in the discretion of the people of the State, just as the election of a judge is in their discretion. If they are capable of electing a judge, they are capable of reelecting him or of deposing him from office.

I understand that, although this system is in force in one of the States of the Union, it has never been exercised, and the probability is that it would scarcely ever be exercised in any jurisdiction where it was adopted. The existence of it would have the effect desired, just as the existence of water transportation alongside of a railroad has the effect of regulating railroad rates, even though the water transportation is not used. The existence of the power and the possibility of using it would have the desired effect of making a judge, where it is unfortunately necessary to take such steps, responsible to the people.

The objection urged against the recall is that we should have an independent judiciary. I infer that Senators who make that argument mean that we should have a judiciary independent of the people. If they do mean that, this is the first time in the history of the struggle of the English-speaking race to establish their present system of government that that contention has been made. The independence of the judiciary, as contemplated by the framers of the Constitution, as contemplated by the English people in the act of settlement in 1688, and in all of the struggles which the English people have had to establish their liberties as against the tyranny of the Crown, meant independence of the monarch and not independence of the people. The struggle was to make the judges dependent upon, or at least responsible to, the people, instead of making them independent of the people. Judges, as Senators well know, when this question came up in the course of years and in the development of the courts upon which our courts are modeled, were absolutely dependent upon the king. The king was the judge, and he delegated certain individuals to take his place, because in the multitude of his engagements he did not have time to look after the individual cases.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. POINDEXTER. He delegated men to take his place. They represented the king, were appointed by the king, and removed by the king at his pleasure. If the king was a benevolent despot, the judge was satisfactory for the time being to the people, but if the king was a tyrant, as he often was, there were protests on the part of the people, and finally there was an establishment of the system that the judiciary should be independent, not of the people, but independent of the king.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington further yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does the Senator not admit that there is a wide distinction between the relations, for instance, of a legislator to the people or an executive officer to the people and the scope of duties that rest upon a judge? The legislator is enacting a law by which the entire people of a State or a nation shall be controlled; an executive officer is enforcing that law; but a judge is deciding a question between private litigants, or he is deciding a question of which the most important feature is that the right of the minority shall be protected; it may be in a matter of religious belief, which awakens the deepest feelings that exist in society and where a majority may be arrayed against a minority. It may be a question involving race prejudice, which again awakens the deepest passions that can arouse mankind, and it may be a contest between one poor, weak human being and the vast majority. If the decision in such a case is to be controlled by the majority of the people, who can invoke a recall against the judge pending the trial, to what tribunal is the minority ever to appeal? To what tribunal under the sun can the one poor unfortunate who is facing the overwhelming sentiment that appears to be against him go? What answer does the Senator make to that, where you can invoke a recall and appeal simply to the right of the majority?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The first answer that I make to that, Mr. President, is that under our Constitution the Senator supposes an impossible case. It is impossible that any court in this country should have before it the decision of a religious question to the extent of enforcing religious obligations upon an individual. The courts have nothing to do with that. That is carefully taken out of the jurisdiction of the courts and of the Government. There is an absolute separation between religion and politics and Government in this country. The Senator is supposing a condition that is impossible.

Mr. CRAWFORD and Mr. ROOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield, and to whom?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CRAWFORD. We can take one instance, which stirred the State of Wisconsin a few years ago to its very foundation, and that was what was known as the Bennett school law, which involved the question of the reading of the Scriptures in the common schools and awakened all the prejudices and feeling that can be aroused upon a question of that kind. A case gets into court; it may involve a religious question; it may involve the enforcement of a quarantine or the invasion of what is regarded as a sacred personal security, against vaccination or something of that kind. Such a case should be tried by an impartial judge and not by a court under the influence of what may be the predominating sentiment of the community; and where is the minority to go for protection if it is at the mercy of a recall? What answer does the Senator make to situations of that kind that do arise?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator from New York will pardon me just a moment, I will say that the case to which the Senator from South Dakota has referred was simply a case which involved the preservation of the very principle which I have just stated—the separation of the State from religious matters. It was not a case which involved the religion or the religious scruples or the religious practices of any individual. The Senator from South Dakota can not devise any system of judiciary which would not be in some degree responsible to the people. You have got to have an appointive power. It is a question of to what degree the judiciary shall be responsible; whether it shall be far removed from the influence of public opinion or whether it shall be subject to a certain extent to public opinion. It is a necessity of the case. The minority can not control the judiciary and the majority can not control it free from the influence of the minority. Under the system which is proposed here the minority have their influence; they have——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. POINDEXTER. They have their means of influencing the election. It is a minority that starts any recall proceedings—one-fourth of the people—the minority of which the Senator is speaking.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Upon that point the power that I want to see maintained in this country, if the Senator will permit me, is the power that the majority can not control and that the minority can not control the courts, just as the Senator said a moment ago. But are you not now, by your recall, removing that situation and putting in its place a situation in which the majority can control? And if the majority can control and review in this country the decisions of the courts, then I ask again to what tribunal can the minority ever go?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will allow me, I will answer the question again; the same question that I think the Senator has repeated several times. Under this system the minority makes its appeal to the public opinion of the State just as it makes its appeal if it is interested in the proposition under the present law in the election of a judge. You can not suppress, and there is no intention to suppress, the expression of the opinion of the minority, their influence in the election; and, as I stated before, the provision in this constitution is that a minority may institute the recall proceedings.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I promise not to keep interfering with the Senator. But upon this very point: We are hearing criticism to-day of a recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. One class of people are saying that they wrote into the statute legislation that they had no right to put into it, and that court will be arrayed before public opinion by one set of people who are radical in their views. Another large number of people will sustain them, because they believe in the conservatism represented by the opinion of the court.

Now, in a case of that kind or in similar cases, does the Senator believe that the power should reside in the people to thrash out all of the intricacies of an involved question of that kind and determine—as nonexperts—who is right and who is wrong, and have their decision become the permanent law of these United States? During one administration, sir, the controlling power may be conservative and would uphold with enthusiasm every decision that John Marshall wrote. The next administration might be radical, and if they had the power, might reverse and overthrow every decision that John Marshall wrote.

Where would there be any permanency, I ask the Senator, in the decisions of the courts of this country if all could be reviewed by the majority under the recall or put in the maelstrom of heated discussion and an interrogation point lie beyond every decision? No one would know what the decision of the majority will be. Does the Senator believe that our courts in this country should be placed on a footing of that kind?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No proposition has been made, as I stated before, to establish a universal system of recall. There is no question before this body of recalling the Supreme Court or other Federal judges. But I do say that if the people of this country, acting through constitutional means, desire to provide for the recall of their Federal judges, they should have, and do have, the power so to provide.

The question that is before this Congress is an entirely different one—as to the recall of judges in a State, its local judiciary, dealing with its local matters—and it is not for us to decide the merits even of that question. The question, the merits of which we are to decide, is whether or not those people have the right to determine the question for themselves.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One moment. Does the Senator from Washington yield, and to whom?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from Washington has made the statement that there have been no prosecutions, no litigation, in this country involving religious rights. I can not allow that statement to pass without correction. There have been a number of prosecutions in this country against individuals for exercising what they believed to be their religious duties, and they have involved religious questions; and as the Senator from South Dakota has very well said, there is no question that can be brought before the courts that is likely to involve more prejudice, more feeling, a greater degree of public sentiment that is likely to influence a vote upon a question of this kind, than a religious question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There ought not to be any religious questions before the courts, unless it should be the question of preserving the guaranty of the Constitution that there should be no law respecting an establishment of religion, nor prohibiting the free exercise thereof. I am not familiar with the cases to which the Senator from California refers, but certainly it should be the duty of a court to refuse to decide religious questions—not to decide them, but to refuse to take jurisdiction of them, except as just stated.

But that is aside from the question. Suppose you take it from the judiciary. The question still remains with the people as to whether or not religion is to be interfered with. It still remains with the legislative department to legislate upon those subjects within the Constitution, or with the people to amend the Constitution. So there is no religious principle involved with relation to the judiciary that is not applicable to the legislature and to the people themselves.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. I suggest that the legislature can not affect or change a decision of a court. There is no appeal to the legislature from an erroneous decision of a court.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The legislature can to as great extent and to a greater extent legislate in regard to these matters than a court can decide as to them.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is before they are decided, but after they are decided the legislature can not affect them.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am not speaking of a particular case. I am talking of religious policy and religious establishments. Neither under the recall is there an appeal to the people from a decision of the court. There is no provision whatever for any interference by the people with any decision of the court.

As I stated before, I have no apprehension that evil will result from placing in the hands of a free and intelligent people the power by orderly and solemn process to remove from his high position a judge who disgraces it by corruption, cruelty, or willful injustice. There is no danger of the masses of the people, actuated by public opinion, seeking to do injustice to some individual litigant in a court, as Senators seem to apprehend, nor that the majority will be controlled by malice or a desire to oppress some individual as to his case pending in a court.

The fear of a judiciary entirely responsible to the people is a class fear. It is fostered principally by the powerful growth, both natural and artificial, of our modern private monopolies, which are not so often seeking justice in our courts as they are seeking favor and special advantage.

In putting this provision into their constitution the people of Arizona are engaged in a new phase of the same struggle their ancestors were engaged in—to free the judiciary from the control of powers and influences above and beyond the people. The guaranty of a republican form of government was a guaranty against monarchy or oligarchy. Does a single Senator in this body believe that it was intended as a limitation on popular rights?

The recall of judges in England is lodged in the Parliament. Popular government is far more extensive and powerful in England than it is in this country. Parliament can recall immediately without notice any judge in England, and Parliament is directly subject to public opinion in England.

There is no such system of checks and balances there as there is here, and yet that is the country which meets with favor as to their system of government with the conservative Senators who seem to be afraid of intrusting power in the hands of the people.

The referendum is continually put into practice in England. Immediately upon an adverse vote on a question of national concern it is submitted to the people, and if the people act upon it the result of their action takes immediate effect in the assembling of the newly chosen House of Commons, which is the governing body of England—not as in this country after an intervening period of more than a year, during which time a Congress repudiated by the people, not responsible to the people, as expressed in their votes, meets and legislates for those people; and even after that period the will of the people as expressed at the polls takes effect only as to one of our two legislative Chambers.

There have been no disasters with respect to the peace and order of the community and the security of property and the sacredness of personal rights in England by vesting in the people control over their judiciary and the control, the absolute control, and the immediate control over their Parliament.

There are those, sir, who hold up in this country the referendum as a populistic, and socialistic, and anarchistic proposition, and yet when our Canadian brethren across the line submit the reciprocity treaty to a referendum, immediately those who are opposing it in this country begin to say "it must be all right if the conservative Canadians in the Dominion of Canada adopt it."

The learned Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] says that we ought not to indulge in experiments, but that we ought to be guided by the light of experience. I should like to know how we can be guided by the light of experience unless we indulge in experiments. You can never tell whether a system is going to succeed, you can never know from experience whether it is going to succeed until it has been tried. We have in this case, as the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] suggests to me, ample experience. It is not an untried field. It has been tried through the centuries and proved to be absolutely safe.

I admit that this whole proposition and the entire Arizona constitution, particularly with reference to those questions that have been raised here, is a failure and falls to the ground at once if the premises laid down by those who have spoken against it here are sound; but I deny the premises. Their proposition is that the people are actuated by passion and prejudice; that they are tyrannical; that they are unintelligent; that they are foolish. I think the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] figures it out in an exact mathematical formula that there are 16 fools out of every 54 electors. I do not think so. It may be so in Utah, but I do not think so, nor in any other State in the Union.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Do I understand the Senator from Washington to state that popular government more generally prevails in Great Britain than in the United States?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes. I said that popular rights and the effect of public opinion in England upon the Government was more extensive, more direct, and more powerful than it is in this country.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do not agree with the Senator in his views, but I ask a further question. Does he state that the power to recall English judges is confided to the Parliament?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senator offers that as a reason, then, why the same power to recall should be vested in the people? The policy of most of the States of the Union, the power recognized in the proposed Arizona constitution, gives the right to remove a judge to the legislature of the several States, and if the Senator from Washington so highly commends the British system, where the power to remove a judicial officer is vested in the legislature of the country, why do you oppose a similar policy here, either in Arizona or in any other State?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not oppose a similar policy here. I have no objection to the legislature of the State having the power to remove a judge. I have no objection at the same time to the power to recall the judiciary being vested in a greater power than the legislature. I think it is more conservative, it is safer, it is more stable than to have it vested in the legislature. I called attention to the English system as demonstrating the fact that you can have a stable judiciary which is subject to immediate recall by a department of the people's government outside of the judiciary.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Does the Senator from Washington state that in Great Britain the policy has ever existed of submitting the recall of a judicial officer to the vote of the people of the electorate?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not recall any instance in which that was involved. I can readily imagine——

Mr. O'GORMAN. I think we will be agreed that never in the history of the English Government have the people been permitted by a popular vote to determine whether a judicial officer shall retain his position or not.

I only alluded to this observation of the Senator because in my opinion he is singularly unhappy in his illustration.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to say to the Senator, in reference to his last suggestion, that never in the history of Great Britain have the people of Great Britain, by popular vote at the polls, placed a judge upon the bench, any more than they have taken him from the bench. At the same time, in the great State of New York, in which the Senator graced the judicial bench for a long term of years, the people select their judges at the polls. I think, using the Senator's own language, the Senator from New York is singularly unhappy in his illustration and argument against popular control of judges in this country in calling attention to the fact that the English people do not, by popular vote, either select or recall their judges, because we have demonstrated in this country that, notwithstanding that is a fact in England, there is nothing impossible about it in this country. Popular choice or popular rejection of judges at the polls has been eminently successful in most of the States of the Union.

I did not cite the power of Parliament over the judiciary as being identical in all respects with the power proposed by the constitution of Arizona. I did cite it as a demonstration or as an argument that if you can trust the legislative power with control over the tenure of office of the judges, by the same sign and for much stronger reasons you can intrust the people with control of the judiciary.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I hope the Senator from Oklahoma will excuse me for a moment. I can readily see in case an issue should arise in Great Britain over the removal of one of their judges by Parliament that it would make an issue upon which the people under their system would act. If Parliament in its attempt to remove a judge, or if the Government should propose a bill removing a judge, if it were an issue of sufficient public interest, involving questions of sufficient importance, and that resolution should be defeated in Parliament, immediately the question would be submitted to the people of Great Britain and it would be decided at the polls.

I do not hold up the Government of Great Britain as a model in all respects. No government is perfect. Nearly every government has some features better than other governments. We have some that are better, and Great Britain has some that are better than ours. I can readily understand the position of the Senator from New York. Coming from that section of Great Britain in which I understand he had his origin, or his ancestors, he would deny the proposition that Great Britain has a popular government. I agree with him entirely in that respect, as to that particular operation of the Government of Great Britain, but I still contend that the action of public opinion in Great Britain has more direct and complete influence in the enactment and execution of its laws than public opinion has in this country. Parliament is immediately responsive to the people, and its power under the people is supreme. Its acts can not be vetoed by the executive nor held invalid by the judiciary. The influence of the people in choosing the Senate of the United States is diluted through the legislatures; only a portion of the legislature is chosen in a single election, and only one-third of the United States Senate, at intervals of two years. Furthermore, our constitutional system has been perverted by the growth of the power of party conventions, caucuses, and committees, entirely irresponsible to the people, to an extent undreamed of in England.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. I wish just to emphasize what the Senator from Washington is saying, that the conservative class of Great Britain regard the electorate of Great Britain as more conservative than the Parliament itself. They expressed that opinion in the tax laws proposed by Parliament in appealing to the body of the people against the more progressive action of the Parliament itself.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is very true. The privileged class of England have sought to appeal again and again to the people against the progressive program of the House of Commons. The constant practice in Great Britain is to submit to the people all questions of national importance upon which there is a vote against the Government in the House of Commons. In some instances, when there is no adverse vote, upon the voluntary action of the Government it is submitted, as in the instance suggested by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Referring again very briefly, Mr. President, to the assertion which is made that the independence of the judiciary will be destroyed by giving the people an opportunity at times other than at the regular election to decide upon the tenure of office of judges, I want to say again that a judge's true character soon becomes known and established in his general reputation, and the accuracy of such popular estimate is proved by the rule of evidence which makes such general reputation competent evidence. Who is there, sir, who believes that a judge who by this true test bore a general reputation for honesty, fearlessness, integrity, and general competency on the bench could ever be removed from office by popular vote, even though in some particular case he should render an unpopular decision?

There has been an unfortunate suggestion made in some quarters—I have not heard it in this body—that one thing to be considered in determining whether we should adopt the joint resolution as reported by the committee is the probability that Arizona would elect two Democratic Senators. I have no idea whether that is true or not, but the suggestion, coming from whomsoever it may, is most unfortunate. The time has long gone by when a political party can make capital for itself by calculating as to the gain or loss of a Senatorial vote by the admission of a State into the Union. I do not think that that consideration will influence the vote of a single Senator in this body. I refer to it chiefly in response to suggestions which have been made throughout the country outside of this body.

The fact of the case is that, so far as parties are concerned, while it is true, as has been said, that this is a government by parties and must continue to be so, jockeying between the organizations of two great political parties, which organizations unite to effectuate their common purposes whenever a certain interest and a certain political system is involved, has largely destroyed the healthy, robust, partisan sentiment which once existed in this country in either one of the political parties of which we are now members.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The statement of the Senator from Washington that partisan advantage has been suggested on the floor is entirely new to me.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I said that I had not heard it suggested on the floor. I have heard it suggested in other quarters, outside of Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want to say that so far as my observation has gone—so far as our relation to this subject is concerned—I do not believe that the question of political partisanship has entered into this matter at any stage, and I should feel very badly, indeed, if I thought that any Member of the Senate or any officer of the Government would be guided by that spirit in the consideration of a matter so important to the people of both Territories.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I am thoroughly satisfied that what the Senator from Michigan has just said is the sincere expression of his feelings upon that subject, and that his conduct will be governed by that feeling. I know that to be the case, and, as I said before, I believe that to be the case with every Senator. But nevertheless the question has been discussed and is being considered; whether or not it is anticipated that it would influence the action of Congress I do not know. It will not influence, in my judgment, the action of this body.

The tendency in the relations of parties in this country toward a natural party division, between a liberal party and an ultraconservative party, and that such a real division and natural alignment does not exist at the present time, is emphasized by the fact that this very question which I have just suggested is not a question being discussed before Congress at this time, while on former occasions, when the admission of States into the Union was proposed, it was discussed and was one of the paramount principles which determined the action of Congress.

A good deal has been said, Mr. President, about the general character of the constitution of Arizona. It is to be noted that most of those Senators who are opposed to the admission of Arizona into the Union under its constitution are in favor of the admission of New Mexico under its proposed constitution. I think that circumstance is very significant. It raises a query at once as to whether, if the proposed constitution of Arizona did not extend popular rights and the influence of public opinion in the government but took the opposite direction, the Senators who are opposing it would not be in favor of it. I infer that they would be in favor of it if it took an opposite direction, limiting and curtailing the rights of the people, because, as I said, they favor the constitution of New Mexico, which contains, among other curious provisions, one of the most remarkable that was perhaps ever incorporated in a constitution for a self-governing State. It is in the third section of the nineteenth article of the constitution of New Mexico, and is as follows:

SEC. 3. If this constitution be in any way so amended as to allow laws to be enacted by direct vote of the electors, the laws which may be so enacted shall be only such as might be enacted by the legislature under the provisions of this constitution.

In other words, the delegates to that constitutional convention undertook to limit the action of the people of New Mexico for all future time to be in accordance with the views of these delegates upon these propositions. If I should find myself at any time in the position of opposing the admission of States to the Union under such a constitution as they themselves choose to adopt, I would far rather oppose the admission of a State into the Union on account of a reactionary provision in its constitution such as that I have just read from the constitution of New Mexico undertaking to tie the hands of the people forever. It seems to me an insolent suggestion to the people of that Territory to undertake to say to them that they can not in the future enact a constitution except such as meets the approval of these delegates. Of course, the provision will have no effect; there is no power in the convention to make such a provision. Nevertheless, it shows the sort of an instrument prepared and the intention of those who adopted it.

I wish to read very briefly, as a part of my remarks, from the same address of Mr. Walsh, which I referred to before, a quotation incorporated into it from an article by Irving Browne, in the Green Bag, in 1890, relating to the judiciary, in which he says:

I have given the names of more than 100 judges, with particulars of many of them—

Referring to the judiciary, I will say to the Senator from New York, of his State:

I believe that under a system of appointment by the governor this test would not have been equaled in merit and distinction, and I point to it as a standing refutation of the argument that the people are not fit to name their judges.

Of course, if they are fit to name them at one time they are fit to name them at another time and to pass upon their fitness in a recall election.

In the American Law Review, answering this statement of Mr. Browne, Mr. Leonard Jones says:

The worst thing, however, about the elective system is not the fact that it affords unworthy men the chance to obtain judicial office by purchase or other corrupt practices, but that it necessarily, to a greater or less extent, destroys the independence of the judges.

The same argument is made against the elective system of judges that is made against this provision in the Arizona constitution. He adds:

What chance is there that a judge who is shortly to seek a reelection by the people will uphold the law and justice in a case where the popular clamor is against law and justice?

Rightly the gentleman who wrote this paper commenting on the quotation simply says:

What chance, indeed, unless he be a man and not a caitiff?

With that kind of a judge the argument has added force as it is directed against the elective system, because that kind of a judge is likely to solace himself with the reflection that, so far as the recall is concerned, it may not be invoked against him anyway, while if his term is expiring and he seeks reelection he is up against it to a certainty. Moral courage is a quality cardinal in character in a judge. He is called upon to exercise it in the daily discharge of his duties. He is fortunate, indeed, if he is not obliged repeatedly in his official career to brave the enmity of powerful interests whose activity is more to be feared than an outburst of passion upon the part of a community or State against an upright public official who faithfully discharges his duty as he sees it.

Of course, there have been a great many facetious remarks and frivolous arguments made against this system, and in one attack which was made upon it it is said that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] amused himself by booting the composite citizen around the Senate Chamber. That probably will not be as interesting as the composite citizen booting a candidate for the Senate around the State of Utah. It is a game in which there are compensations. If one is to be booted, of course he likewise has an opportunity to boot. The Senator from Utah says that he is in favor of giving the privilege to the voters of Utah to vote upon the election of Senators of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If it does not interrupt the Senator, his strictures on the New Mexico constitution, so far as the right to change it is concerned, I do not desire to controvert at this time, but I simply desire to say to the Senator that 56 per cent of the qualified voters of New Mexico voted for that constitution. I think it is the largest percentage of votes cast for the constitution of a new State of which I have any figures or with which I am at all familiar.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Two-thirds of the voters in Arizona voted for the constitution of Arizona.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; the Senator is mistaken. The total vote on the approval of the Arizona constitution was 12,187 votes out of a total voting population of 45,323. There were 3,822 votes cast against it, and 35 per cent of the qualified voters——

Mr. POINDEXTER. How many votes were cast for it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Twelve thousand one hundred and eighty-seven out of 45,323.

Mr. POINDEXTER. How many votes were cast against it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Three thousand eight hundred and twenty-two.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I said two-thirds. There were more than two-thirds of the people voting on the proposition in favor of the constitution.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; the Senator is mistaken. Thirty-five per cent of the total number of qualified voters voted in favor of the constitution and 8 per cent of the total population voted in favor of it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator is talking about the qualified voters. I am speaking of the votes that were cast upon that question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In order to be perfectly understood I will say that by the census returns in 1910 Arizona has a population of 204,354, of whom 155,550 are native born and 48,804 foreign born. Of this population 118,576 are males and 85,778 females. The total number of white males over 21 years of age is 65,133, of whom 39,427 are native born and 5,896 naturalized.

So of the total voting population, apparently 45,323, there were cast for the constitution 12,187 votes; against it 3,822, or a total of 16,009 on the question of its adoption, being about 35 per cent of the total number of qualified voters and slightly less than 8 per cent of the total population. The votes for the constitution were less than 27 per cent of the voting population and 6 per cent of the total population.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will permit me just a moment, I should like to say that I have no issue whatever with the Senator from Michigan, because I am in favor of the joint resolution in the form in which it has been reported here by the committee for the admission of these Territories, and upon the same ground he has just mentioned as to the Territory of New Mexico, that these constitutions have been acted upon and adopted by the majority of the people of the proposed States, as represented by those voting upon the question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The votes that I have just read for the information of Senators are not intended as a disparagement of their claim, but in order that there may be no question as to the number of qualified voters of the Territory and the number of votes actually cast.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington now yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. BOURNE. The fact in reference to the votes cast on the Arizona constitution is that 62 per cent of the voters of the Territory, as represented by the vote for Delegate in the previous election, voted at the constitutional election. Out of that 62 per cent 76 per cent of the 62 per cent voted in favor of the adoption of the constitution as it is now before the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Some remarkable propositions are submitted in attacking this proposed constitution by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. Among others, I find the remarkable statement that—

Everybody will agree that the average man is not as intelligent, as able, or as honest as the ablest, or the most intelligent, or the most honest.

I do not know what deduction the Senator from Utah proposes to draw from that profound statement. I suppose everybody will agree that the man who is not able is not as able as the man who is able. However ominous it may be, I suppose we must admit it. Having carefully laid this deep foundation, the learned Senator boldly proceeds to his apparent assumption that 1 man is more honest than 10, and that the governing business should be cheerfully intrusted to as few as possible—logically this would be the one ablest and best that the Senator speaks of—while the rest of the people devoted themselves to "feeding and clothing families of 6 or 8 or 10 children." The Senator merely ignores the more or less widespread idea that a more direct participation in the government and control over their officials may be of some benefit in the rearing of these families.

He says:

There are some who seem to imagine there is some mysterious virtue in mere numbers; that 10 men are necessarily more intelligent, more moral, and more honest than 1 man; that by adding together a thousand individuals, none of whom has ever gone beyond the multiplication table, some strange and weird transmutation results by which the combined mass is enabled to work out the most difficult problem in Euclid with the utmost accuracy.

Of course there is not any such contention as that made. Nobody is proposing to submit a problem in Euclid to the combined mass of the people; but should it be so submitted, it would be accurately solved, for Euclid himself, in the person of every great mathematician in the land, would be engaged upon it. I do not view this matter in the sense of composite action or composite citizenship. It is the individual action of all citizens acting as individuals, creating what is known as public opinion. The Senator from Utah proceeds to conclude his argument in this wise:

Thus, following out this highly intelligent theory—

He says with fine sarcasm and irony—

whenever one is anxious to have a message carried with the greatest haste from one part of the city to another, obviously the thing to do is to employ not the fleetest messenger boy in the service, but arrange with 10 or a dozen average boys to unionize the job.

I think that the entire argument on both sides of this question may be epitomized in that illustration which the Senator from Utah has adopted; and the fallacy of his proposition is perfectly patent in that statement. It is not proposed to eliminate the fleetest messenger boy, supposing that the object to be accomplished is to send a messenger with the utmost dispatch and safety—it may be added, and security—from one part of the city to another, and to put in his place 10 average messenger boys. That is not the proposition at all. The proposition is that in the performance of this work, if you want to use messenger boys as an illustration, we will take the entire force of messenger boys, and they will all work together, the fleetest backed up by the strongest and most enduring and most reliable. We will have not only the fleetness of the hare, but also the industry of the tortoise, which sometimes wins the race. We are not going to exclude the fleetest messenger boy, as the Senator from Utah supposes; we are not going to eliminate the ablest men; we are not going to take out of the action of the people in these matters all the wisest and best men and leave only average men. I think he allows that there are three wise men out of every 54, and he says they will be eliminated, and the average man will be taken. I do not know where he gets that notion. It is for the very purpose of securing the action of both the wise and good, who under the machine system of politics are too often entirely excluded, that popular government is proposed. If there are only three there, you need them all the more, and we want to keep them there. We are going to let them have their influence; and I want to say that they will have their influence in the community in proportion to their wisdom. If one man is abler, smarter, more enterprising, and more successful than another in the community, his influence will be in proportion to his virtue and his superiority over his neighbors.

I submit to the Senate that if we want to accept the illustration of the Senator from Utah, supposing there is a difficult task for a messenger to perform, or if we are going to undertake to do a difficult, dangerous work—to "carry a message to Garcia"—we would be more apt to succeed, we would insure the success of the enterprise by commissioning to perform it all the forces which were available, if it were possible to do so, and not by eliminating any of them. But the case is far more conclusive than the illustration. Nothing in human action can be compared with the combined, orderly, and systematic action of an entire people.

The proposition made by the Senator from Utah is entirely a mistaken conception of the purposes of these provisions. He says that there are 16 good citizens and 3 wise men. I do not know exactly what distinction the Senator proposes to make between the wise men and the good citizens; but by some fantastic alchemy which he claims will be put into operation by direct legislation or the recall of public officials these wise men and good citizens will lose their virtue and wisdom, and in a sort of Dr. Jekyll fashion be changed and merged into a dull-witted imaginary monster filled with weak or evil passions which the Senator from Utah idealizes as the "average man." The real average man is a much better person. The truth is that under the outworn system of party machines there was a subtle political chemistry which operated like a death blight on the public activities of the best and wisest men in many communities, and the purpose of the new plan is to call them into the greatest activity.

This system, as I said before, is not untried as it is contended. For six years the people of Oregon have had it in operation successfully and to the entire satisfaction of that State. I suppose if it had not been for that actual demonstration the matter would not now receive the support throughout the country that it is receiving, because the people of this country are essentially a conservative people; they are not disposed to depart from the old forms of government. As Thomas Jefferson wrote in the Declaration of Independence:

All experience hath shown that mankind are more disposed to suffer while evils are sufferable than to right themselves by abolishing the form to which they are accustomed.

It is only upon great provocation, and gradually, and by trial, experiment, labor, patience, observation, and trying these things out that the people of any community of this country can be induced to accept them.

Some Senators talk about the people of Arizona as though they were a foreign people, from Central America or the island of Haiti, and did not have a conception of free government and the ability to administer their own affairs. They have gone there and have worked out already a system of good government for their Territory. Through that experience and that labor and that tribulation they have made themselves able to adopt a satisfactory and safe constitution for their own government, and that is what they are asking Congress to recognize.

Of course, it is easy enough to reduce the whole matter to an absurdity by imagining extreme cases, and that method is continually used in opposition to this joint resolution.

One Senator says, "You can not have too much of a good thing," and then goes on to draw a ridiculous picture of some extremes which might happen, which nobody has ever proposed. "You can not have too much of a good thing," he says, with solemn dictum, in arguing this question. You can have too much of any good thing, and all the evil in the world, so far from that statement being true, comes from having too much of good things. You can have too much of anything, and whenever you do have too much of it, it becomes, instead of a good thing, an evil. Everything in the world is good if you do not have too much of it. It is no argument against this constitution or against the system of government proposed under it to imagine extreme cases to which nobody ever proposed it should be extended.

Wise men framed the Government of Athens, and wrote upon the walls of their temple—one of the axioms by which the people were to be guided—that there should not be too much of anything. It means temperance and moderation. If one can not have too much of a good thing, the Senator should at once propose that his system of selecting only the wisest and best should be carried to its logical conclusion, and the best and wisest man, if he can be found, be made the absolute ruler of us all.

I am not called upon here to defend the operation of the principles of this law in the experiences which the people have had with it through a great many years in the State of Oregon. The Senator says that it is a failure, because in one instance there were a number of votes against a statute submitted to the people which he says was a bad statute. A great many people in his party might differ with him as to whether or not it was a bad statute. It is no argument against the intelligence of the people, supposing him to be right in that respect, that they defeated it, even though there was a minority that voted in favor of it. It is easy enough to pick instances in this body, in Congress, when laws which Senators might consider to be absurd receive the votes of a number of Senators. I am satisfied that this joint resolution that the Senator from Utah characterizes as so dangerous, so unconstitutional, so absurd, and so much without reason, just as he characterizes this statute of Oregon, which, he said, demonstrated the stupidity of the people of that State, because some of them voted for it; that this joint resolution, which the Senator from Utah says is so bad, will receive the votes of a majority of the Members of this body. The fact that the Senator from Utah does not agree with the statute which received the votes of a certain number of the citizens of Oregon, even though they were a minority, is not any argument against the success of the system.

I remember one case which the Senator cited as an instance of the incapacity of the people of Oregon, where the seine fishermen in the lower Columbia River proposed a law to shut off the wheel fishermen in the upper Columbia, and the wheel fishermen of the upper Columbia proposed a law to shut out the seine fishermen in the lower Columbia, and he says that the people of Oregon showed their utter incapacity in that matter by enacting both laws. I submit, Mr. President, that that was a very reasonable and sensible thing to do. The result of it was that it put the regulation of that matter back into the hands of the legislature; and anybody who is familiar with the fishing business in the Columbia River knows that it was a very good and sensible thing to shut it off for a while, so as to give, for at least one year, an opportunity for the salmon to replenish the river. I do not consider that instance, which the Senator from Utah so elaborates, as a reason why this system should not be adopted, nor as any demonstration whatever that the people were not capable of discriminating. I think it was a case where they exercised good judgment.

The Senator from Utah says that—

> The recall contemplates not an "empire of laws" to be executed with impartiality and exactness, but an empire of men who punish not according to some fixed and definitely prescribed rule, but according to their undefined, unrestrained, and unlimited discretion.

There is no proposition in this constitution, sir, to suspend the operation of law, to interfere with due process of law, or to abolish any function of the Government. Every case that is in litigation in Arizona, if this constitution is adopted, will come for trial before a court constituted with the same full powers and jurisdiction of any other trial court, with a judge chosen by the people and sworn to execute the law. There is no provision for interfering in any way with a decree of a court except in the ordinary processes of appeal or motion. I am at a loss to understand the purpose of arguments of that kind against this proposed constitution, because they are calculated to deceive no one. If the statement were true, we might well vote against this joint resolution. It is not true, but is utterly unfounded.

He quotes John Adams—and that is as pertinent as the argument some Senators have advanced that this plan is not a republican form of government—as saying:

> That form of government which is best contrived to secure an impartial and exact execution of the laws is the best of republics.

The constant difficulty under the present status, which the Senator from Utah is so loath to change, is that there is neither impartiality nor exactness in the execution of the laws. Cabals in the Government, as in the case of the pure-food laws, either construe them out of existence or modify their application to suit private interests. Too often it is the case in the courts that the great and powerful escape entirely the vengeance of the law, which is enforced with a heavy hand upon the poor and weak.

The Senator further says:

> But under the system they will in the end get legislators that no thoughtful people ought to have and judges whom no free people should be satisfied with.

The word "system" is in italics in the RECORD; not in quotation marks. "Under the system!" How true it is that "under the system" they have had "legislators that no thoughtful people ought to have and judges whom no free people should be satisfied with." The "system" of corrupt politics and corrupt business has in many instances imposed such officials upon the people, and I presume that that is the reason the citizens of Arizona adopted a provision in their constitution by which they can get legislators and judges whom a free people can be satisfied with, and if they are to be in reality, and not in name only, a free people we must not take from them the means of working out this salvation.

If this were an irrevocable proposition, Mr. President, such as was attempted to be incorporated in the constitution of New Mexico, and there were a provision in this constitution that these measures, once adopted, could never be revoked, there might be some reason for pausing before passing this joint resolution; but the fact is that at all times they are subject to the action of the people. There are liberal provisions for the amendment of the constitution by the people, and if at any time in the operation of these new agencies of popular government, which have already been tried by the people of a great State in this Union for a number of years, they should prove unsuccessful, the same people who have adopted them have the power to revoke them.

I submit, Mr. President, that this Senate and this country can not afford to establish for the first time in our history the proposition that a Territory which is to be admitted into the Union shall not have the right, within the limits of the Constitution of the United States, to frame its own local government in accordance with the desires of its people. Should we degrade Arizona, and by mere power force her to change her constitution, and admit her, so humbled, into the Union, every other State, being her equal, will be likewise humiliated.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I shall vote upon the pending measure in the way which, in my judgment, will most certainly insure these Territories admission as States to the Union. The constitutions submitted by the respective Territories conform to the terms of the enabling act. They are also, in my judgment, republican in form, as that term was used and is understood in the guaranty clause of the Federal Constitution. I propose to vote for their admission, therefore, notwithstanding there is one provision in the Arizona constitution to which as a principle and policy of government I do not subscribe. But the right of local self-government is an indispensable—and, to my mind, should be an inviolate principle under our system, and notwithstanding my individual views and objections I must concede the right of the people of Arizona to settle that question for themselves. So long as their constitution is republican in form I feel that the proper rule is to leave the details to the people who are to live under it.

But in view of the fact that either or both of the resolutions require the submission of the question of the recall of judges again to the votes of the people, I want to submit some reasons why, in my judgment, the people should not retain it in their constitution. In other words, I am not quite willing to cast my vote for the constitution of Arizona without a word upon this important subject. I am not willing that my vote shall be construed as an indorsement of the principle. While it is not unrepublican in form, I believe it to be unwise in principle. While the people of Arizona, under the great and indispensable and inviolate rule of local self-government, have the right to settle it for themselves, I want, in the friendliest spirit toward these splendid people of Arizona, to suggest something as to the wisdom of retaining it.

There is another reason which leads me to this conclusion, and that is that we would have no power to keep this provision out of the State constitution of Arizona if Arizona were once admitted. In other words, while we might compel Arizona to leave this provision out during the period of being admitted to the Union, upon the admission being complete Arizona could reinstate it in the constitution. I think, therefore, that it serves no good purpose to demand temporarily that which we can not effect permanently. It seems to me that we ought, therefore, to submit this matter in reason and in argument and leave it at last where our system of government intended all such things should be left—to the people of the State—to settle.

The ultimate object, Mr. President, of all good government is to at last insure an impartial distribution of justice. The purpose and object from the beginning in the affairs of government are to at last see that each and every citizen is fairly dealt with in the administration of the law by the courts. As I view it, an independent and an untrammeled judiciary is indispensable to the attainment of that high purpose.

When I say an "independent judiciary" I do not mean, as has been suggested by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], a judiciary independent of the people, but I mean faithful construction and interpretation of the law as the peoa judiciary authorized to act and delegated to perform its duties independent of any other influence than that of the ple through their lawmaking department have written it. It is not a fair statement of the position of those who oppose the recall of judges to say that they desire a judiciary independent of the people. They believe that a judiciary controlled by no influence outward or exterior to the terms of the law is a judiciary which best serves the interests of the people. That, in our judgment, constitutes the fairest and ablest judiciary, and the fairest and ablest judiciary is the best judiciary for the people.

If I could have my way, I would elect all State judges, but I would elect them for a reasonably long term of years and at a time when general elections were not to be held. I would give an opportunity free of politics as it is possible to have it for the election by the people of their judges. But I would strive to remove them further from politics rather than bring them closer and oftener to it. I would also strive to have their elections turn upon their general qualifications, their character, learning, and standing, rather than their decision in a particular case.

As to the Federal judiciary, I would leave it as it is. I do not believe the wisdom of the fathers could be improved upon in this respect. I would, however, carefully guard the Federal judiciary from some influences to which I shall refer later. There was no division, Mr. President, among those who framed the Constitution upon the subject of life tenure for judges. Those who wrote the Federal Constitution differed upon almost every important subject which came before them, and differed extensively and earnestly upon many of said subjects. But upon this, in some respects, the most important proposition upon which they were called upon to pass, there was practically no difference of opinion. When the measure came finally to be voted upon as to the provision for the life tenure of judges or service during good behavior, if I recall the history of that convention correctly, there was no dissenting vote.

It is true, I believe, that Mr. Dickinson moved at one time that the judges be subject to recall or removal by the President upon the petition of Congress, but this received practically no support. Mr. Wilson, of Pennsylvania, who was perhaps the most thorough advocate of popular principles in the convention, who was in favor of electing Senators by popular vote, who went so far as to say that there was no necessity for the representative principle in government other than the fact that the people could not all meet together, earnestly opposed even the resolution submitted by Mr. Dickinson. Upon this question, this principle so essential and indispensable, and in some respects new, considering the jurisdiction and the power of the court, there were no differences of any moment between the fathers who framed the Constitution.

I desire before proceeding to the argument to call attention to some declarations upon the part of those who have given much attention to this subject, because I think we can not safely proceed with a discussion of these matters dissociated entirely from the experience and wisdom of those who have gone before. We will find as we review their declarations that the reasons submitted have not been changed because of any change in the condition of affairs; in other words, the reasons which prompted those men to do as they did and to create the judiciary in the way they did are reasons which, it seems to me, ought to obtain at all times, as they apply to society under whatever form or condition that society may be found to exist.

It was said many thousand years ago in the Book which is the foundation of all our building morally that—

> Ye shall not respect persons in judgment; but ye shall hear the small as well as the great; ye shall not be afraid of the face of man.

That represents the attitude and the position of the ideal judge. While I am frank to confess that no system which the ingenuity of mankind can devise would bring about that exact condition of affairs, the effort upon the part of the human family should always be in the direction of securing that kind of a tribunal. Again, in this same great Book it is said:

> Thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honor the person of the mighty; but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbor.

The design should be to place the tribunal which distributes justice between man and man in such a position that no influence shall work other than the single influence of administering equal and exact justice, regardless of whether the party is poor or rich, great or small, influential or otherwise. If I mistake not the wisdom which has gone before, if I mistake not the influences which control human nature, if I mistake not the powers which effect and mold our action consciously and unconsciously, the principle of the recall of judges would work against that proposition rather than in favor of it.

The Father of our Country, in writing his letter of April 3, 1790, to Mr. Jay, notifying him of his appointment as Chief Justice, said:

> I have always been persuaded that the stability and success of the National Government and consequently the happiness of the people of the United States would depend in a considerable degree on the interpretation and execution of its laws. In my opinion, therefore, it is important that the judiciary system should not only be independent in its operation, but as perfect as possible in its formation.

John Adams said:

> The dignity and stability of government in all its branches, the morals of the people, and every blessing of society depend so much upon an upright and skillful administration of justice that the judicial power ought to be distinct from both the legislative and executive and independent upon both, that so it may be a check upon both as both should be checks upon that. The judges, therefore, should be always men of learning and experience in the law, of exemplary morals, great patience, calmness, coolness, and attention. Their minds should not be distracted with jarring interests; they should not be dependent upon any man or body of men.

Mr. Hamilton, discussing this question in one number of the Federalist, said:

> The considerate man of every description ought to prize whatever will tend to beget or fortify that temper in the courts, as no man can be sure that he may not be to-morrow the victim of a spirit of injustice by which he may be a gainer to-day. And every man must now feel that the inevitable tendency of such a spirit is to sap the foundations of public and private confidence and to induce in its stead universal distrust and distress.

Mr. Bayard, in the noted discussion which took place in Congress over the judiciary at the beginning of the last century, used these strong and admirable words:

> Sir, the morals of our people, the peace of the country, the stability of the Government rests upon the maintenance of the independence of the judiciary. * * * The essential interests, the permanent welfare of society require this independence not, sir, on account of the judge—that is a small consideration—but on account of those between whom he is to decide. You calculate on the weakness of human nature, and you suffer the judge to be dependent on no one, lest he should be partial to those upon whom he depends. Justice does not exist where partiality prevails. A dependent judge can not be impartial. Independence is therefore essential to the purity of your judicial tribunal.

Again, he said:

> Let their existence depend upon the power of a certain set of men and they can not be impartial. Justice will be trodden under foot. Your courts will lose all public confidence and respect. The judges will be supported by their partisans, who in their turn will expect impunity for the wrongs and violence they commit. The spirit of party will be inflamed to madness, and the moment is not far off when this fair country is to be desolated with civil war. * * * The independence of the judiciary was the felicity of our Constitution. * * * Prostrate your judges at the feet of party and you break down the mounds which defend you from this torrent.

Mr. Webster said upon one occasion:

> There is nothing after all so important to individuals as the upright administration of justice. This comes home to every man; life, liberty, reputation, property, all depend upon this. No government does its duty to the people which does not make ample and stable provision for the exercise of this part of its power. Nor is it enough that there are courts which will deal justly with mere private questions. We look to the judicial tribunal for protection against illegal or unconstitutional acts from whatever quarter they may proceed. The courts of law, independent judges, enlightened juries, are citadels of popular liberty as well as temples of private justice. The most essential rights connected with political liberty are there canvassed, discussed, and maintained; and if it should at any time so happen that these rights should be invaded, there is no remedy but a reliance on the courts to protect and vindicate them.

Upon another occasion, speaking in eulogy of the life of Justice Story, Mr. Webster said:

> I pray Heaven that we may never relinquish the independence of the judiciary. A time-serving judge is a spectacle to inspire abhorrence. The independent judge draws around him the respect and confidence of society. Law, equity, and justice require that this should be done and that should not be done. And judicial decisions should command entire acquiescence from full confidence in the purity and integrity and learning of the judge.

Mr. Kent, the first great commentator upon American law, says:

> The independence of the judiciary is just as essential to protect the Constitution and laws against the encroachment of party spirit and the tyranny of faction in a republic as it is in a monarchy to protect the rights of the subject against the injustice of the crown.

Mr. Story, in his well-known work on the Constitution, says:

> Upon no other branch of the Government are the people so dependent for the enjoyment of personal security and the rights of property, and it is hardly necessary to add that the degree of protection thus afforded is conditioned in turn upon the wisdom, stability, and integrity of the courts.

We think of Edmund Burke generally as alone and only a great orator, but he was a master of the science of politics, using that term in its highest and best sense. Among the multitude of brilliant men from that unhappy isle he stands out distinct and impressive in not only his brilliancy, but his profound insight into government. He said:

> Whatever is supreme in a State it ought to have as much as possible its judicial authority so constituted as not only to depend upon it, but in some sort to balance it. It ought to give security to its justice against its power. It ought to make its judicature, as it were, something exterior to the State.

Mr. Harrison, late President of the United States, said:

> Courts are the defense of the weak. The rich and powerful have other resources, but the poor have not. A high-minded, independent judiciary that will hew to the line on questions between wealth and labor, between the rich and the poor, is the defense and the security of the defenseless.

Wendell Phillips during his career had something to do with the question of the effect of popular sentiment upon the judiciary and upon judges. He spent his brilliant career in defending a class who at that time had few defenders in any part of this country. He realized the fact that no system could entirely remove the judiciary from the effect and control of popular opinion, and I realize that, do what we may and struggle as we will, the power of popular opinion will intrude itself at times into the temple of justice. Wendell Phillips said upon an occasion when this subject was being discussed:

> We know the unspeakable value of a high-minded, enlightened, humane, independent, just judge—one whom neither fear, favor, affection, nor hope of reward can turn from his course.

I desire to call briefly the attention of the Senate to later authorities as I seek to cover some considerable time in history in order to get a drift of opinion in this matter.

Dr. Woodrow Wilson has been quoted a number of times of late by reason of his peculiarly honorable and high position in public thought, and I call attention to a word from him upon this subject. He has given it his consideration, not only from the standpoint of a student, but of late undoubtedly, as he has other questions, of a man in the practical affairs of life.

> The recall is a means of administrative control. If properly regulated and devised, it is a means of restoring to administrative officials what the initiative and referendum restore to legislators, namely, a sense of direct responsibility to the people who choose them.
> The recall of judges is another matter. Judges are not lawmakers. They are not administrators. Their duty is not to determine what the law shall be, but to determine what the law is. Their independence, their sense of dignity and of freedom, is of the first consequence to the stability of the State. To apply to them the principle of the recall is to set up the idea that determinations of what the law is must respond to popular impulse and to popular judgment.
>
> It is sufficient that the people should have the power to change the law when they will. It is not necessary that they should directly influence by threat of recall those who merely interpret the law already established. The importance and desirability of the recall as a means of administrative control ought not to be obscured by drawing it into this other and very different field.

Col. Roosevelt, speaking to the people of Arizona, said:

> Speaking generally, and as regards most communities under normal conditions, I feel that it is to our self-interest, to the interest of decent citizens who want nothing but justice in its broadest sense, not to adopt any measure which would make judges timid, which would make them fearful lest deciding rightly in some given case might arouse a storm of anger, temporary but fatal. You should shun every measure which would deprive judges of the rugged indifference and straightforward courage which it is so preeminently the interest of the community to see that they preserve.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. Is it not only fair to ex-President Roosevelt that his statement, made either at that time or at some subsequent time, to the effect that as to one of these States, at least, they should have a judicial recall, should accompany his suggestion there? I understood him to make such a suggestion later.

Mr. BORAH. I have not that statement of Col. Roosevelt, although I know that he made it; and if the Senator from Minnesota has it, I shall have no objection to incorporating it in my remarks when I print them.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I apprehend that the Senator from Minnesota refers to the State of California. In substance, Col. Roosevelt did make the statement in my State that conditions might exist, and he was led to believe they did exist in the State of California, which would justify the recall of judges.

I happen to know something about how that change of sentiment came about. Col. Roosevelt was interviewed by certain gentlemen, who undertook to make him believe that the condition of the judiciary was worse in the State of California than it is elsewhere.

Now, I desire in this place to resent that sort of a statement made with respect to the judiciary of the State of California. It is not true. Col. Roosevelt was misled with respect to it. The judiciary of the State of California will compare, in my judgment, in honesty, in integrity, and wisdom with that of any other State in the Union. We have some bad judges in the State of California—I suppose they have some in almost every State in this country—but they are few and far between, and there is no justification for the statement made by Col. Roosevelt that the recall should be applied to the State of California more than to any other State in this Union.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator from Idaho will pardon me, I certainly did not intend to share in any reflection on California, because when I called the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the statement I had it in mind that Col. Roosevelt applied the suggestion to Arizona.

What I wanted to say was that the quotation which the Senator from Idaho was making would seem to be made for the purpose of using Col. Roosevelt as an authority against the recall; and in that connection I did think his entire statement upon the subject ought perhaps to be considered.

Mr. BORAH. The statement which I quoted was made by Col. Roosevelt upon his visit to Arizona and to the people of Arizona; and I feel entirely free to say that notwithstanding the Colonel made some remarks in California, occasioned by a representation as to local conditions, he still feels as he bespoke himself in Arizona.

Mr. President, the State constitutional convention held in 1829 in the State of Virginia was one of the most remarkable conventions of that class that has ever been held in this country. The subjects which were up for discussion were subjects of profound interest to the people of the entire State and had excited a great deal of discussion upon the part of the people.

The membership of the convention was extraordinary. Ex-President Madison was a member of the convention. Ex-President James Monroe was its president and presided at such times as his health would permit. The brilliant and somewhat ill-fated genius, John Randolph, of Roanoke, was also a member of the convention. The Chief Justice of the United States, John Marshall, had consented to give to his native State the benefit of the wisdom of his ripened years and, though Chief Justice, he was a member of that convention. He was now in his seventy-fifth year, a stately and sublime figure.

His career had been a singularly great one. He had been a soldier at Brandywine, at Germantown, at Stony Point, and at Valley Forge. He had been a lawyer of surpassing ability at the bar. He had been a Member of Congress, and as such made the celebrated argument in the matter of the extradition of Nash which, it is said, settled the law so far as that class of cases is concerned.

He had represented his country at foreign courts. He had been for years the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, and as such had written the opinion in the case of Marbury against Madison, of Gibbons against Ogden, of McCulloch against Maryland, the Dartmouth College case, and other noted cases, which laid broad and firm the foundations of constitutional law in this country. No man then living was a greater master of constitutional law, of the science of jurisprudence, than John Marshall, and it was in this debate that he expressed his views with reference to this important subject. I think I can recall a paragraph from the debate:

> Advert, sir, to the duties of a judge. He must pass between the Government and the man whom the Government prosecutes. He has to pass between the most powerful individual in a community and the poorest and most unpopular. It is of last importance that in the performance of this duty he preserves the utmost fairness. Need I press the necessity of this? Does not every man feel that his own personal security and the security of his property depends upon that fairness? The judicial department comes home in its effect to every man's fireside. It passes upon his property, his reputation, his life, his all. Is it not to the last degree important that he should be rendered perfectly and completely independent, controlled alone by God and his conscience? I have always thought from my earliest youth until now that the greatest scourge an angry Heaven ever inflicted upon an ungrateful and sinning people was an ignorant, a corrupt, or a dependent judiciary.

Mr. President, we are not at liberty to wholly disregard the views of one who not only knew the law from the study which he had given it, but had known what it was to discharge the duties of a judge under very trying circumstances. He had grappled with questions upon which the life of nations depend and under merciless fire. No man ever more completely lived up to the philosophy expressed from his lips than John Marshall had lived up to the philosophy which he gave to the convention in his declining years at the time they were framing the constitution of Virginia.

We do not gather very much information, in my judgment, from reading the superficial account conveyed to us by the historian who begins with the discovery of America and completes in two or three volumes his history down to the present day. In it there is very little information of the real contests, the real conflicts which tried men's souls, especially in the quiet walks of life. The pomp and circumstance of war occupy much time and space, but too little is known of the heroes who, in quiet devotion and with unshaken courage, worked out the legal and constitutional principles upon which turned the happiness of millions. But if we will delve down into the controversies, the newspaper reports, and the information which we gather in that way we will find that John Marshall lived to a remarkable extent and in a most trying way the wisdom which he coined in a single paragraph to that convention.

When he wrote the opinion in the case of Marbury versus Madison, wherein it was held for the first time by the Supreme Court of the United States that an act of Congress coming in conflict with the Constitution was void it immediately gave rise to earnest discussion. We were then in the formative state of our Government. That question, as it was believed by many, reached to the very basic principles of our Government, and it was claimed that John Marshall had taken the opportunity or advantage of his position and had legislated and written into the Constitution a provision not there to be found. The storm of abuse, of criticism, not alone upon the part of the masses but by the great leaders of the country, was calculated to shake the firmest in his conviction. It was believed that he had rendered an opinion which destroyed to a large extent the principle upon which the Government itself was supposed to rest.

It was said here in debate a few days ago that a recall of the judges would likely change the view that an act of Congress in contravention of the fundamental law would still be void. I do not attribute to the recall of judges such a disastrous effect. I do not believe that that would happen at this time, but I have no doubt at all from a very earnest examination of the history of those days that it would have led at that time to a change of that situation and a reversal of that rule. If anyone doubts the extent to which the opposition went, they can ascertain by looking into the detail of those archives which are hidden away in the history of our Government. But Marshall never wavered. He said, in effect, I find here a supreme fundamental law, made by the people themselves, under a referendum, and no law made by the representatives of the people can override a fundamental law made by the people themselves. He was a true friend of a people's government.

Scarcely less bitter was the criticism at the time he rendered his opinion in the case of Cohens v. Virginia. At that time the Supreme Court announced for the second time that it would review the decision of a State court where a Federal question was involved. This led to the pronouncement upon the part of the State that it would not abide by the decision of the court. It was so earnestly and firmly believed that the Government was being centralized to the extent of the destruction or elimination of the sovereign integrity of the State that men earnestly, conscientiously, profoundly believed that Marshall had committed what one distinguished writer at the time called a "judicial crime." John Randolph said:

> All wrong, all wrong; but no man in America can tell why or wherein it is wrong.

It was a criticism of the law, but a profound compliment to the logic of Marshall.

Mr. President, taking the time of the Senate for a moment longer, we find another and a more peculiarly interesting event when Marshall came to try, to sit as a trial judge at the trial of Aaron Burr. Here was a man of remarkable gifts, of splendid attainments, and, as one historian says, possessing the quickest and most active mind that ever animated 5 feet 6 inches of clay, charged with treason. He was abhorred, and justly so, by the then President of the United States, the most popular man at the time in the country. He was equally disliked, if not abhorred, by John Marshall, and yet John Marshall must preside at the trial of the man who I have but little doubt Marshall thought entertained within his bosom the purpose and plans of treason.

Juror after juror went into the box when Burr was being tried, and stated either that he was of the opinion that Burr was guilty, or that while perhaps technically he had escaped the law that morally he was guilty; and some three or four weeks were exhausted in trying to get a jury. Finally a jury was sworn, which no one can doubt had before it took its oath really made up its mind as to his guilt.

There was a universal demand and a claim upon the part of those in power as well as the masses of the people that this man who was engaged in treason against his Government should suffer the penalty.

And yet Henry Wirt, the brilliant advocate, said that it was Marshall's decision which stepped in between Aaron Burr and death. Marshall held to what they declared was a mere technical pretense for the purpose of preserving the life of Burr—that unless he was personally present when the overt act was committed he could not be tried under that indictment. Thus it was practically withdrawn from the jury, and the jury were not permitted to pass upon the question of his guilt or innocence, and indeed the jury refused to return a verdict of not guilty, in so many words, but would only consent to say that he had not been proven guilty in accordance with the instruction and the indictment.

The concluding paragraph of Mr. Marshall's judgment in that case is worth remembering, in view of the attack which was made upon him. He said:

> That this court does not usurp authority is most true. That this court dares not shrink from its duty is not less true. No man is desirous of placing himself in a disagreeable situation. No man is desirous of becoming the peculiar subject of calumny. No man, might he let the bitter cup pass from him without self-reproach, would drain it to the bottom. But if he has no choice in the case, if there is no alternative presented to him but the dereliction of duty and the opprobrium of those who are denominated the world, he merits the contempt as well as the indignation of his country who can hesitate which to embrace.

Now, I ask my friends who say that these popular influences do not control men: What was it that enabled John Marshall to sit upon that trial, trying a man whom he utterly detested, without a single manifestation of passion or fear, when every other prominent citizen of the United States seemed influenced and controlled by that popular passion and fear? At least all joined with it. The President, his Cabinet, and the leaders of public thought denounced the decision. John Marshall refused to permit personal hatred, popular condemnation, or fear to enter the temple where he presided.

We can not expect human nature to be supreme in all events and over all circumstances, it is true, but we ought to be careful in the trying hour in which a judge is called upon to pass upon such conditions not to load him with the things which control men in spite, ordinarily, of anything that they may do.

I would not contend for a moment that Marshall had any keener sense of right and justice than some of the men who criticized him, but he realized that he was in a place where he must listen to no other influence, no other direction, than that which was found in the provisions of the Constitution which he was called upon to construe. Other men, unconsciously influenced by another power, arrived at just the opposite conclusion and were equally honest and equally upright. Will we burden our judges in such an hour with this extra burden?

Mr. Rawle, in speaking to Marshall's life at the dedication of a monument to him in this city in 1884, and referring to the Burr trials, said:

> The impartiality which marked the conduct of those trials has never been excelled in history. No greater display of judicial skill and judicial rectitude has ever been witnessed. * * * The judge was unmoved by criticism, no matter from what quarter, and was content to await the judgment of posterity.

The judgment of posterity has been rendered. It comes of all classes. His masterly spirit, like that of Washington's, has rebuked party lines, and men of all shades of political belief and party affiliations pay willing tribute to the greatness of his service as a judge. I quote from among a countless throng of admirers two distinguished men of our times, and I choose them in part because their party affiliations would not lead them into an inconsiderate partisan eulogy. The Hon. Richard Olney, ex-Secretary of State, upon the occasion of the celebration of the centennial of the installation of the first Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, said:

> If it be true—as it is beyond cavil—that to Washington more than to any other man is due the birth of the American Nation, it is equally true beyond cavil that to Marshall more than to any other man is it due that the Nation has come safely through the trying ordeals of infantile weakness and youthful effervescence and has triumphantly emerged into well-developed and lusty manhood.

The late Edward J. Phelps, upon the same occasion but at a different place, said:

> Looking back now upon this long series of determinations (Marshall's decisions), it is easy to see how different American history might have been had they proved less salutary, less wise, and less firm. The court did not make the Constitution, but has saved it from destruction.

Would any American, looking back over such scenes and realizing that perhaps the difficulties which we have known are small compared with those which we are to know, burden a court with any other consideration or subject it to any other influence than that of a full, faithful, and fearless construction of the Constitution of the laws of the land, regardless of the temporary benefits, or supposed benefits, to be derived from a temporizing construction? The people had made the Constitution. It had been referred to them, and they had approved it. It was the people's law, and John Marshall, in the supreme majesty of his genius, made it the title deed to nationality, as the people intended it should be. Passing conditions and temporary circumstances would have modified it, but he did not accede to these conditions or circumstances.

Mr. President, I only recall these matters as an illustration of the conditions which sometimes must necessarily confront every high judicial officer. If I can be satisfied with the purity of the manner in which a judge is elected or selected, I want thereafter for him to be able to consult no other influence than that which has been crystallized into the Constitution or the statutes by the people, and it is just as much to the interest of the people and to their welfare that that be so as it is to individuals or special interests.

It is sometimes charged that the courts legislate, and that this is one of the reasons why the recall should be adopted, to prevent the courts from legislating. My own opinion is that it would be only one more influence which they would have to resist in order at times to prevent themselves or restrain themselves from legislating.

But the charge that the courts legislate is not one which is as important or as aggravated a charge as is sometimes supposed. I grant you that there are instances in which the courts seem to construe a statute other than as the Congress or the legislature wrote it. I know of some instances in which I would arrive at a different conclusion from the conclusion reached by the court. But, Mr. President, as a matter of fact, the pronounced instances in which a court legislates are very few and very rare indeed, and most of those are superinduced and compelled by reason of the inefficient language employed by the lawmaking body. You find me a case where the court seems to legislate and I will find you a statute uncertain, ambiguous, or impossible of execution under a literal construction—a statute not very credible to the lawmaking body.

Let me call your attention to an instance in which it was alleged that the court legislated. We passed an immigration act in 1884 or 1885, if I remember correctly, and we prohibited any corporation, individual, or company from going abroad and hiring persons for service or labor and bringing them to this country. There was no exception in the rule except with reference to actors and lecturers and one or two others, and so all other persons, in plain language, were prohibited from being brought into this country under hire for service or labor.

The Holy Trinity Church of New York City employed a minister abroad and brought him here, and some one proceeded, under the statute, to collect the fine for violating the law. The court below, looking at the statute, said "this includes all persons for service and for labor, by any individual or by any corporation," and it rendered a judgment in favor of those who were contending for the fine. The matter went to the Supreme Court, and the court held that Congress could not have intended to include ministers, and thereby wrote into the statute, in effect, the word "ministers." There was no dissenting opinion in that case.

The entire court agreed that the intent of the lawmaker was the law, and it was clear that it was not the intent, from the object and purposes of enacting the statute, to preclude the employment of ministers of the gospel abroad and bringing them here to attend their church or congregation. Thereby it is true in effect that they technically wrote into the law the word "ministers." They did it, Mr. President, in my judgment, under a rule of law that is older by far than our jurisprudence, as old as any jurisprudence, and that is to ascertain the real intent of the lawmakers, taking into consideration the objects which they had desired to accomplish. The court must sometimes deal with loose legislation, and the legislators protect their own shortcomings by asserting that the court legislates.

It was said in debate here the other day also that they had written into the fourteenth amendment some words not to be found there or given a construction not justified by the language of the fourteenth amendment. In other words, it was contended that the fourteenth amendment was passed to apply to negroes alone, and that the court had written into it such language as would cover corporations and other individuals.

A slight investigation of the history of the passage of that amendment will show that not only does the language of the amendment cover other persons, but that the design and purpose, as shown by the debates, was that it should. It might not be the construction which you or I would arrive at with reference to the meaning of the amendment, but the court arrived at the conclusion that the intent of the framers of the instrument was as they interpreted it to be, and I think the debates of Congress will show that. I submit here some declarations on that subject by those who were in a position to know. Roscoe Conkling, who was in Congress at the time, afterwards said:

> At the time the fourteenth amendment was ratified, as the records of the two Houses will show, individuals and joint-stock companies were appealing for congressional and administrative protection against invidious and discriminating State and local taxes. One instance was that of an express company, whose stock was owned largely by citizens of the State of New York, who came with petitions and bills seeking acts of Congress to aid them in resisting what they deemed oppressive taxation in two States, and oppressive and ruinous rules of damages applied under State laws. That complaints of oppression in respect of property and other rights, made by citizens of Northern States who took up residence in the South, were rife, in and out of Congress, none of us can forget; that complaints of oppression, in various forms, of white men in the South—of "Union men"—were heard on every side, I need not remind the court. The war and its results, the condition of the freedmen, and the manifest duty owed to them, no doubt brought on the occasion for constitutional amendment; but when the occasion came, and men set themselves to the task, the accumulated evils falling within the purview of the work were the surrounding circumstances, in the light of which they strove to increase and strengthen the safeguards of the Constitution and the laws.

Senator Edmunds declared:

> There is no word in it that did not undergo the completest scrutiny. There is no word in it that was not scanned and intended to mean the full and beneficial thing that it seems to mean. There was no discussion omitted; there was no conceivable posture of affairs to the people who had it in hand which was not considered.

Senator Howard, who had charge of the report, said:

> * * * The last two clauses of the first section of the amendment disable a State from depriving not merely a citizen of the United States, but any person, whoever he may be, of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or from denying to him the equal protection of the laws of the State.

So, Mr. President, we are engaged in asserting oftentimes that there is legislation upon the part of the court, when, in fact, it is engaged in what it must necessarily do in arriving at the most righteous conclusion it can from ambiguous or uncertain or complicated language and from the intent of the lawmakers. There are very few decisions found in the Supreme Court of the United States where that is not the rule. There are very few opinions in which it could not be justly said that notwithstanding the statute has been construed to cover a subject not covered by the literal words it is covered by the rule that the intent of the lawmaker is the law. That has been true ever since we have had jurisprudence.

I do not defend, nor would it be any compliment to the Supreme Court if I should, each and every opinion which has been rendered by that court. I know that there are individual opinions which do not meet with my approval and which, in my judgment, ought to have been rendered otherwise. But take the hundred and more years which have marked the work of that court, dealing with the most profound questions ever submitted to a tribunal, complicated with the different rights of the different States and the people in the States, dealing with interests which involve the welfare of millions of people, and judge it as an entirety and tell me where in the history of the world you will find a tribunal with the record of the Supreme Court of the United States—not always, Mr. President, beyond the reach of possibility of error, but from day to day and year to year and decade to decade dealing with these great questions, administering, in my judgment, the most complete justice that has ever come from a great tribunal.

It is constantly asserted that the courts do not afford the same rights and protection to the poor as to the rich. What occasion will there be for a court to protect the poor man under the recall if this poor man is in court against some powerful individual in the community?

But, Mr. President, I deny this charge, and I could cite hundreds of cases to justify my contention. I contend that there is no place in our Government to-day where those without wealth, influence, or friends are so thoroughly protected as in the courts. There are miscarriages of justice, and there always will be; there are bad decisions, and there always will be; but on the whole our courts are not subject to this attack. Does the executive, the legislature, furnish the hearing and the protection for the friendless which are furnished by the courts? I want to recall a noted case for illustration:

Near the close of the war a man by the name of Milligan was arrested in Indiana for giving aid and comfort to the enemy. Congress, the lawmaking body of the Government, had passed a law suspending the right of the writ of habeas corpus and a commission appointed by the executive branch of the Government had tried him and condemned him to be shot. Here was the Executive, and in the chair no greater man ever sat than sat then in the chair; here was the Congress; and here, if you please, were the people, believing that this man was guilty of treason, striking at the life of the Nation—he was standing under sentence not only of the commission but under sentence of public opinion. But when his case was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, that tribunal, overriding the action of the Executive and overriding the action of Congress, said this man is entitled, according to this instrument which guides us, to a jury trial; and standing alone, with almost every man's hand against him, that tribunal threw about him the guaranties of that instrument which the people had made for the protection of all. The bitterness, the hatred of civil war, all the fiendish, ghoulish malevolence of that conflict could not weigh against this condemned traitor.

Let me read a paragraph or two from that decision. It thrills one with pride and exaltation that they could come in such an hour from our courts:

> Time has proven the discernment of our ancestors, for even these provisions, expressed in such plain English words that it would seem the ingenuity of man could not evade them, are now, after the lapse of more than 70 years, sought to be avoided. Those great and good men foresaw that troublous times would arise, when rulers and people would become restive under restraint and seek by sharp and decisive measures to accomplish ends deemed just and proper and that the principles of constitutional liberty would be in peril unless established by irrepealable law. The history of the world had taught them that what was done in the past might be attempted in the future. The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people equally in war and in peace and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances.

> The crimes with which Milligan was charged were of the gravest character, and the petition and exhibits in the record, which must here be taken as true, admit his guilt. But, whatever his desert of punishment may be, it is more important to the country and to every citizen that he should not be punished under an illegal sentence, sanctioned by this court of last resort, than that he should be punished at all. The laws which protect the liberties of the whole people must not be violated or set aside in order to inflict, even upon the guilty, unauthorized, though merited, justice.

My friends, we demand perfection, the absence of all mistakes, from all bodies and departments except our own. Has Congress no mistakes to its credit? Have the State legislatures, elected every year or two years fresh from the people, made no mistakes? Its names are legion. Have juries drawn fresh from the people and recalled for each trial made no mistakes? Lord Brougham said:

> In my mind he was guilty of no error, he was chargeable with no exaggeration, he was betrayed by his fancy into no metaphor, who once said that all we see about us, kings, lords, and commons—the whole machinery of the State—all the purposes of the system and its varied workings, end in simply bringing 12 good men into a box.

But with all this and these mistakes we will not abolish State legislatures nor juries. We know that with some mistakes there is yet incalculable good. With some poor or bad decisions there are thousands which administer justice and enforce rights between man and man. With some poor or bad judges there are hundreds and hundreds brave, fearless, and incorruptible. As a whole, our system is the admiration of every people on the globe.

When we view our jurisprudence as a whole, when we take its work from the beginning until now, may not we justly and truly say, as was said by the lawgiver of Israel:

> What nation is there so great that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law which I set before you this day?

No one will be quicker to admit than the people themselves that there comes a time in dealing with the affairs of men when there should be not hasty action, but enforced delay and consideration. It is not because men disbelieve, if you please, in the power of the people, but they believe that as a practical matter of administering government these conditions must exist in order that the people's rights may be preserved. It is no compliment to a people to say that calmness and consideration are not to be elements of their final judgments.

I know, too, Mr. President, that politics sometimes has its influence in the highest court. I should like to legislate to prevent rather than to accentuate it. I know there are times when these influences are felt and that the court ought not to give attention to such influences. We all concede that the controversy is how to diminish the effect of it rather than how to increase it; and in my humble judgment the recall of judges, instead of diminishing, would increase it. It would necessarily bring it into politics; you could not prevent it. Merciful justice! have we not enough politics in our system already, such as it is? Shall we now include the courts? You are much mistaken if you think the people want more politics; they want less. If you will give me a lawmaking department which is intelligent and true to the people, an executive department fearless and true with the judicial system which we now have, I will show you the best governed and the happiest people in the world.

But, Mr. President, I am not only opposed to the popular recall, but I am opposed to private recall. I am opposed to the subtle, silent system which has grown up in this country to a remarkable extent unknown to most people—that of exercising an influence upon Federal judges through the executive departments of our Government. If there is going to be a recall, we want a popular recall. We want a people's recall. We want it in the open and not in quiet and subtle ways by devious and undiscovered methods. We want the privacy sought to be established between Federal judges and the heads of departments forever condemned and damned. It is vicious, indefensible, and ought to forever discredit the judge who would brook it or the department head which would seek it.

I am not going to discuss this at length at this time. I hope to do so at a later date. I only want to say now it is well known to those who have examined and watched the system that, during the last few years, when certain departments here are interested in a question they have a system by which they get for a particular cause a judge off the bench that they want off and another on that they want on. They have a system of transfer and exchange carried on formally under the statute, but in fact through the impudent exertion of power upon the part of the interested department. If the time ever comes in this country when the people of the country understand that there is any string attached to a Federal judge which they do not through established laws hold, they will not only elect, but they will recall their Federal judges. Those who are preaching against the recall of judges throughout this country must be careful that they do not adopt a system which will far outweigh the strength of their words and overcome their arguments. When the system goes so far that an assistant United States attorney privately approaches a Federal judge to suggest that he disqualify himself to sit in a particular case or formally consent to be transferred because some one else is wanted to try the case, it is time that the system should be exposed. The statutes provide for changes when necessary because of disqualification or an extra amount of business, but it contemplates that it be done in the open, and if a judge is actually disqualified let the disqualification be shown in the presence of the contending parties.

Another practice has been growing up year by year for the last few years, until, in my opinion, much of the strength of the recall to-day arises out of the belief that those who may effect the promotion of judges exert through the different departments an influence that ought not to be submitted to under any circumstances. Those who want to prevent a recall in this country must not play politics with the Federal judiciary, nor seek to select judges for particular cases other than in the way prescribed by statute. They will not be able to withstand the demand to make judges subject to the recall of the people unless those judges are permitted to act without being subject to the suspicion that they are subject to a private recall. Be it said to the credit of the Federal bench that generally it has as much contempt for this system as it ought to have.

Speaking for myself, I would not as a result of it establish a popular recall as to judges, but I would make haste in all proper ways to recall and forever condemn those who would seek to perpetuate the system. Our judiciary has never been subject to criticism, except in those instances where there was an extraordinary, a persistent, and a determined effort to bring to bear the influence of politics. It is just in proportion as that influence has had its effect that our judiciary is subject to criticism.

Mr. President, I maintain that in writing a law, in placing upon the statute books a guide or rule of action for men, we ought to listen closely to the instructions of a well-formed and well-sustained public opinion. I am aware that the complex and involved conditions of modern questions require much study and long training upon the part of the successful legislator. But this is only a part of the equipment and only a part of that which should go into the law. Upon no question with which we deal here can we afford to ignore that wholesome, practical wisdom born of the reflection and experience of 90,000,000 people. It is a remarkably safe guide. It has served this country well when wise statesmen seemed powerless to determine upon a policy. It has in it something of that strength, that saving common sense, that intuitive sense of equity and justice not always found outside of the great forum where men gather wisdom in the actual struggle for existence. The law should embody in its enactment not only the technical skill and more profound insight of the trained legislator but it should embody as nearly as may be the practical information of the railroad owner and the laborer, of the banker and the farmer, the merchant and the lawyer, and the countless thousands upon whose integrity and industry rests the whole vast fabric of modern business and out of whose experience must come also our humane and beneficent policies.

But after the law is written the man who construes it, and by its terms measures out to each citizen his duty or his obligation, should consider nothing but the terms of the law as written. He has nothing to do with its leniency or its harshness, its wisdom or its unwisdom. He is not to consider the effect of its enforcement unless it be when there is doubt as to its terms. He can not consider his own interest, he can not seek the advice of friends, and he can serve the people in no other way than by faithfully construing the law which the people, through the law-making department, have written. Though the public welfare, the public interest, and public sentiment seem to be on one side and only the legal rights of an humble, obscure citizen upon the other, his duty is still the same. He is an unworthy judge if he considers otherwise. He must reply to all influences, be they private or public, as the chief justice replied to the English king who sent to know if he would consult with him before rendering his decision: "When the cause is submitted I will decide as becomes the chief justice of England." If the law be a bad law, detrimental to the public welfare, the people may modify or repeal it. But the judge who legislates not only violates his oath, but undermines the basic principles of our institutions and opens the door to injustice and fraud.

The most paltry being who slimes his way through the machinery of government is the judge who seeks to locate the popular side of a justiciable controversy. The man of small fortune or limited means will always suffer in a contest with influence or wealth in such a court. Instead of a trial, if he has a just cause, he will get demurrers and postponements, costs, and that delay which in the end constitutes a denial of justice. How many lawyers representing a poor or obscure client have not heard the client breathe a prayer of relief if it could be said to him, "This judge before whom you are going will decide absolutely as he sees the law; the influence of your antagonist will not affect him." Unless a judge is corrupt or in some such way at fault, which things may always be dealt with under the law, I want him to know when he takes his oath that he is to serve the stated time for which he has been elected or chosen. I want him to feel and know that for that length of time he can walk unafraid in constant company with his own conscience and follow, without fear or favor, the light of his own intellect. The distribution of justice is the most solemn and most difficult task which government imposes upon men. Human nature is weak for the task at best. Remembering this, we should not impose upon those who are called to this high service our selfishness, our objections, our prejudices, our partisanship, unrestrained by their oath or their obligations, unsteadied by their sense of responsibility. We should rather brace and prop them for the work in a way best calculated to inspire courage, confidence, and independence. It is my deliberate and uncompromising opinion that without a free, untrammeled, independent judiciary popular government, the government of the people, by the people, and for the people, would be a delusion—a taunting, tormenting delusion. That is the unbroken record from the dicasteries of Athens to the mimic tribunals of justice which are found to-day in some of the Republics to the south.

I am afraid that the principle of the recall as applied to judges will tend to establish the rule of the majority in matters of judicial controversy. It will tend to make decisions bear the color and drift of majority rule or party domination rather than that of a faithful rendition of the law and the facts. What is the basic principle of democratic or republican government? We sometimes urge that the first principle is that the majority shall rule. That is true in making laws and determining policies, but it has no place in and will destroy republican government if applied to the courts or to controversies to be determined under the law. There all men are equal. Back of the rule of the majority is the great principle of equality, the basic, bedrock principle of free government. The difference between the old democracies or republics, which perished, and ours, is that the ancient republics could devise no way by which to shield the rights of the minority. Though the majority must rule, yet a government which has no method for protecting the rights of the minority—for it has rights—is a despotic government, I do not care whether you call it a monarchy, an aristocracy, or a republic. A government which will not protect me in my rights, though I stand alone and against all my neighbors, is a despotic government. If our courts are taught to listen, trained by this subtle process of the years to hearken to the voice of the majority, to whom will the minority appeal for relief? If the voice of the majority controls, if this principle finally comes to be recognized in the timidity of judges, to what power in our Government will the isolated, the unfortunate, the humble, and the poor go for relief? Where will those without prestige, without wealth or social rank go for protection?

It is easy, Mr. President, in our zeal to put forward under the guise of popular government things which will challenge the saneness or practicability of the entire movement and thus bring discredit and defeat to great and important measures. It is indispensable to the success of all efforts to secure results for the people that we should distinguish at all times in proposed changes between that which experience has proven to be evil and that which experience has proven to be good. We must not mistake the mere spirit of reckless change for the throes of progress. The intellectual capital of a single decade is too small upon which to proceed to the business of changing the fundamental basis of government—we must add to it the accumulated experience of all the past. Many a splendid movement for better government has become surfeited with an excess of ecstasy and thus surfeiting "sicken and so die." It requires just as much judgment, coolness, and persistency, just as much common sense, just as shrewd and keen a regard for the common experience and the peculiar qualities of human nature to achieve good legislation for the people as it does to enact the bad. When we take an unwise or an impractical position we have contributed something to the victory of the opposition.

There is a vast amount of practical common sense in the ordinary American citizen. He is never long in error. He loves liberty, but he also in the end demands security and stability. He would not long accept a proposition which would imperil the stability and independence of the judicial system for which his ancestors fought for three centuries. One of the main questions settled by the English revolution of 1688 was that the people should have the right to appeal for protection to an independent tribunal of justice. Prior to that time the judges were subject to removal by the King. Under this power he took some of the keenest intellects and brightest minds of the English bar and made of them the corrupt and willing instruments of oppression and injustice. Rather than to go before such a tribunal Essex took his own life in the tower. Under this system Pemberton was appointed, that he might preside at the trial of Russel, and was then recalled because his instructions, though strikingly unfair and partial, were not sufficiently brutal to satisfy the insatiable monster who had given him his soiled and polluted ermine. Under such a system the martyr of English liberty, Sydney, was beheaded; freedom of speech was destroyed, habeas corpus denied, and individual rights trampled under foot. So when the English yeomanry drove their monarch from the throne they wrote into the terms of the "act of settlement" that "judges' commissions be made during good behavior and their salary ascertained and established." This took it out of the power of the King to remove the judges and out of his power to impoverish them by withholding their salary. This was the first step toward an independent judiciary, and it was not long until the great English orator could truly say, in speaking of this to the English people:

> Though it was but a cottage with a thatched roof which the four winds could enter, the King could not.

Thereafter, instead of Jeffreys denouncing and cursing from the bench the aged Baxter, instead of Dudley taunting and tormenting the New England colonists, instead of Scroggs and Saunders, subtle and dextrous instruments of tyranny, we have Somers and Holt, and York and Hardwick, and Eldon and Mansfield laying deep and firm the great principles of English law and English justice, principles which still shield and guard the personal rights of every member of the English-speaking race, principles which our fathers were careful to bring here, principles which every American citizen would unhesitatingly shoulder his musket to defend and preserve.

No less fruitful of great names and commanding figures has been the system in our own country. Jay and Marshall, Taney and Kent and Story and that line of judges, reaching down to the distinguished and cultured Chief Justice who now presides over the Supreme Court. The intellect, the character, the best there was in these men of heart and mind, years of consecration and toil, are embedded in our jurisprudence, and constitute to-day the greatest of all guaranties for the perpetuity of our institutions and the continued happiness and prosperity of the common people.

Sir, it seems to me that the experience of the past has closed the discussion as to the necessity of an independent judiciary. A feeble, a timid, an obedient judiciary, whether to popular demand or king, has always in the end proven to be an incompetent, a cruel, or a corrupt judiciary. Such a judiciary leaves human rights uncertain and worthless, unsettles titles, destroys values, leaves the workman and the employer alike without protection or guidance, and has more than once demoralized or destroyed governments. Trade, commerce, or labor have never, and will never, flourish or prosper under an unstable and unreliable system of courts. Whether you look upon the wreck of ancient republics and democracies where the courts yielded their decisions to the triumphant faction or party or to modern monarchies where the miserable instruments of kingly power served well their master, whenever and wherever in all history you find a dependent judiciary you find that it is the man of limited means, the poor man, who suffers first and suffers most—the man who has not the wealth to purchase immunity or the prestige to command decrees.

If there is any man in the world who is interested in having a brave, able, fearless, independent judiciary, judges who will, as against influence or power, political or financial, interpret the law as it is written, it is the man of limited or no means. His small holding, the honor of his name, his liberty, even his life, may be in jeopardy. If so, does he want a judge who will listen to wealthy friends or political advisers? Does he want to approach a tribunal above which rests the threat of political humiliation or punishment? Does he want to meet in court some political dictator? I repeat, the man of influence, of means, may contend against such odds, but the humble citizen without prestige or wealth can not do so. We owe it to ourselves and to posterity, to the institutions under which we live, and above all to the common people of this country, to see to it that our judiciary is placed, as nearly as human ingenuity can do so, beyond the reach of influence or any of the things which may cloud the mind with passion or fear or dull the conscience to the highest demands of even-handed justice.

Mr. President, in order that what we do for the people may be permanent and beneficial, in order that our honest purposes may not come back cursed with frailty and impotency, let us not ignore the plainest dictates of reason and the soundest principles evoked out of all these years of experience. While we pursue with unwonted zeal the abstract rights of man we are at the same time bound to remember man's nature. We want liberty and popular government, to be sure; but unless these are accompanied with wisdom and justice, unless there goes along with all reforms the homely, practical, common sense which takes notice of man's vices as well as his virtues our efforts will end at last in the misery of failure. When the people have written the law, then let us have an independent judge, free from any political fear, to interpret the law as written until the people rewrite it. The people's courts can no more survive the demoralizing effect of the vices of majorities in the administration of justice than the king's courts could stand against the influence of their masters.

Sir, we can never, never afford to forget that a republic, too, must have its element of stability—its fundamental law and its independent judiciary to construe and apply it. A democracy can not be as changeful as the moods of a day and long endure. A republic must have in it the element of respect and reverence, of devotion to its institutions and loyalty to its traditions. It, too, must have its altars, its memory of sacrifices—something for which men are willing to die. If the time ever comes when the fundamental principles of our Government as embodied in our Constitution no longer hold the respect and fealty of a majority of our people popular government will, as a practical fact, not long survive that hour. The poorer classes, the overworked and humble, those without wealth, influence, and standing will cry for rest and find it in any form of government which can give it to them. I look upon an independent judiciary as the very keystone to the arch of popular government. Without it the wit of man never has and never can devise a popular scheme of government that will long protect the rights of the ordinary citizen.

I have often thought if there is a sacred spot on the face of God's footstool made so by the institutions of man it is in front of the tribunal where presides the Chief Justice of the United States. There you may take the poorest, the most unfortunate individual in the land and he is heard, heard, sir, as if he stood clothed with all the influence which wealth and friends could bestow. Though he stands there with every man's hand against him and every right denied, that tribunal throws about him the guaranties and protection of the Constitution, the fundamental law which the people have made for the protection of all, and he stands upon an equality with every other man in the land. Even though he be too impecunious to file a brief, with no less care will those painstaking and overworked and devoted men examine into and determine his cause. And if in the end judgment shall be rendered in his favor, if need be the power of this Union will enforce its terms. Do we appreciate the worth of this tribunal and the great underlying principles which have made it what it is? Do we understand how this Government of ours without this steadying, stable, immovable tribunal of justice would go to pieces in a decade? A decade, Mr. President! Rather should we say to all practical effects it would depart in a night. Not a court beyond the possibility of error, not a court whose opinions are to be deemed above the reach of fair and honest criticism, but a court which, whether viewed as to the reach and scope and power of its jurisdiction or as to its influence and standing, its ability and learning, its dedication and consecration to the service of mankind, is the greatest tribunal for order and justice yet created among men.

I sympathize fully and I want to cooperate at all times with those who would make the political side of our Government more responsive and more obedient to the demands of the people. I know that changed conditions demand a change in the details of our Government upon its political side. But the rules by which men who distribute justice are to be governed and the influences which embarrass them in this high work are the same now and will always be the same as they have ever been. Let us not impeach the saneness and the worth of our great cause by challenging the great and indispensable principle of an independent judiciary. Let us not mislead the people into the belief that their interests or their welfare lies in the direction of justice tempered with popular opinion. Let us not draw these tribunals, before which must come the rich and the poor, the great and the small, the powerful and the weak, closer, even still closer, than now, to the passions and turmoils of politics. Let us cling to this principle of an independent judiciary as of old they would cling to the horns of the altar.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, the act of June 20, 1910, provides for the adoption of a constitution by the people of Arizona. It is further provided in the twenty-second section of the act:

SEC. 22. That when said constitution and such provisions thereof as have been separately submitted shall have been duly ratified by the people of Arizona, as aforesaid, a certified copy of the same shall be submitted to the President of the United States and to Congress for approval, together with the statement of the votes cast thereon and upon any provisions thereof which were separately submitted to and voted upon by the people. And if Congress and the President approve said constitution and the said separate provisions thereof, if any, or if the President approves the same and Congress fails to disapprove the same during the next regular session thereof, then and in that event the President shall certify said facts to the governor of Arizona, who shall, within 30 days after the receipt of said notification from the President of the United States, issue his proclamation for the election of the State and county officers.

The act further provides, in section 23:

When said election of State and county officers, members of the legislature, and Representative in Congress, and other officers above provided for shall be held and the returns thereof made, canvassed, and certified, as hereinbefore provided, the governor of the Territory of Arizona shall certify the result of said election as canvassed and certified, as herein provided, to the President of the United States, who thereupon shall immediately issue his proclamation announcing the result of said election so ascertained, and upon the issuance of said proclamation by the President of the United States the proposed State of Arizona shall be deemed admitted by Congress into the Union by virtue of this act on an equal footing with the other States.

The joint resolution which is now before the Senate provides:

That the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona are hereby admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, in accordance with the terms of the enabling act approved June 20, 1910, upon the terms and conditions hereinafter set forth.

"The terms and conditions hereinafter set forth" are, in substance, the requirement that the people of New Mexico shall again vote upon that provision of their proposed constitution which relates to the amendment of the constitution and that the people of Arizona shall again vote upon the provision of the proposed constitution which relates to the recall of the officers, including the recall of judicial officers. The provision is that if the people of Arizona, voting upon this clause of the constitution which relates to the recall of judges, shall vote to amend the constitution so as to omit judicial officers from the recall provision, then that amendment shall become a part of the constitution; but if the same shall fail of such majority, then the section relating to recall shall remain a part of said constitution.

It follows necessarily, sir, from the provisions which I have read, that the constitution of Arizona and the provision of that constitution relating to the recall of judges is now before the Senate for its approval or disapproval. No man can say that his vote here fails to commit him to the approval of a recall of judges or to a disapproval of that recall. We have resolved that the Territory of Arizona shall be admitted to the Union if the Congress approve the constitution that its people have framed, and only if the Congress approve or if the President approve and the Congress does not approve. The question is squarely and sharply defined. We can not in our vote upon this joint resolution escape an expression of the position taken by the Congress of the United States upon the proposal that judges shall be liable to recall by a popular vote. What we say here is of little consequence; what we do here is of vast importance to the people of our country and to the development of our system of government.

The Supreme Court of the United States has decided in the Coyle case, the case relating to the right of the people of Oklahoma to change the location of their State capital, notwithstanding the provision of the enabling act which forbade that change, that after a Territory has once been admitted as a State, the provisions of the enabling act do not control the action of the State—the court has held that the admission of the State upon an equality with all the other States of the Union carries with it the power to regulate by constitutional provision and by legislation under the State constitution all the matters which are within the scope of authority of any of the States in the Union. The moment the enabling act is passed, the conditions are complied with, and the proclamation is issued, the power of the National Congress over the great field of local self-control has ended.

In the consideration and action of the Senate upon this joint resolution, we speak the last word that it is competent for us to speak regarding the provisions of the State's constitution. The law of the United States under which this Territory is to be admitted has required, and now requires, that the admission shall be only upon the presentation to us of a constitution that we approve. The question before the Senate is, Do we now approve the provisions of the Arizona constitution? If we do, the State will be admitted under that constitution in accordance with the terms of the enabling act; and it will be admitted in accordance with the terms of that act because the constitution has the approval of the Congress of the United States. Are we ready, Mr. President, to approve this provision? If we are, we shall say so by our action upon this joint resolution. If we are not ready to approve this provision of this constitution, we are bound by the law we ourselves have enacted to make that known by our action, and we can not escape the responsibility for or the consequences of that act.

What is the provision relating to the recall of judges? It is contained in the eighth article of the constitution which is before us for approval or disapproval. The first section of that article provides:

SECTION 1. Every public officer in the State of Arizona holding an elective office, either by election or appointment, is subject to recall from such office by the qualified electors of the electoral district from which candidates are elected to such office. Such electoral district may include the whole State. Such number of said electors as shall equal 25 per cent of the numbers of votes cast at the last preceding general election for all of the candidates for the office held by such officer may by petition, which shall be known as a recall petition, demand his recall.

SEC. 2. Every recall petition must contain a general statement, in not more than 200 words, of the grounds of such demand, and must be filed in the office in which petitions for nominations to the office held by the incumbent are required to be filed.

Then follow provisions relating to signatures and statements of the residence of the signers.

SEC. 3. If said officer shall offer his resignation, it shall be accepted, and the vacancy shall be filled as may be provided by law. If he shall not resign within five days after a recall petition is filed, a special election shall be ordered to be held, not less than 20 nor more than 30 days after such order, to determine whether such officer shall be recalled. On the ballots at said election shall be printed the reasons, as set forth in the petition, for demanding his recall, and, in not more than 200 words, the officer's justification of his course in office. He shall continue to perform the duties of his office until the result of said election shall have been officially declared.

SEC. 4. Unless he otherwise request, in writing, his name shall be placed as a candidate on the official ballot without nomination. Other candidates for the office may be nominated to be voted for at said election. The candidate who shall receive the highest number of votes shall be declared elected for the remainder of the term. Unless the incumbent receive the highest number of votes, he shall be deemed to be removed from office upon qualification of his successor.

To summarize these provisions, sir, they amount to this, that at any time after a period of six months one-fourth of the persons who voted at the last election in the State or in the judicial district may, by signing and filing a petition, deprive any judicial officer of the right to his office which he has secured by his election through the casting of a majority of the votes for him in the election. The effect of that is that one-fourth of the electors may decree and effect a reconsideration of the election. That is quite independent, sir, of any action by a majority of the electors at the election which is thereafter to be held. The mere filing of the petition by approximately one-half of the men who voted against a judge sets at naught his election, deprives him of his right to the office, and compels him to seek a new title to the office through another election; and in that other election to which he has to submit himself he has not only to defend his course, to justify his conduct upon the bench, but he has to enter into a contest as against the popularity, the merits, the claims to recognition of one or any number of opposing candidates.

His right to the office to which he has been elected being swept away, he is obliged to go before the people and retry the question of their preference; it may be as between him and the man he has defeated, or between him and some other possibly more popular candidate, under the penalty of ignominy and disgrace following upon the removed official, if his popularity has waned or a stronger and more popular candidate is nominated against him. That is the tenure of judicial office which this constitution proposes to establish in the State of Arizona, if that State be now constituted by our approval of this provision.

Let me ask the Senate to consider for a moment what will be the necessary working of such a system? We all know that from time to time there arise in all courts cases which enlist great popular interest. Sometimes they are cases in which men are accused of crime and there is a well-founded and general public abhorrence of the crime. I submit to the experience of the Members of the Senate the suggestion that the tendency of the public in their abhorrence of a great crime is to assume that the man who is declared by the police authorities to be responsible for it is responsible, to overlook questions of evidence as to whether he be the true criminal and questions as to the degree and character of his guilt, and to assume that the man who is charged is the man who is guilty. The more atrocious the crime the more general and customary is this tendency to condemn a person who is charged with its commission.

Sometimes questions which attract public interest are questions having a political bearing. In our complicated system of government it frequently happens that questions are submitted to the courts upon the determination of which must depend the success of one party or another in establishing its views or in securing the control of the machinery of government. It is but a few days since the courts of my own State passed upon a question as to the validity of the apportionment of the State, and upon their decision rested, perhaps, the question whether one or the other of the great political parties should have control of the government of the State.

Such cases are frequently arising in all of our States, and it frequently happens that there is great public excitement, intense interest, strong desire to have the decision in accordance with the views of political partisans, who naturally consider the view of their own party to be the correct view.

Sometimes such questions arise from the conflict of religious opinions. I have heard it said in this Hall to-day that courts can never pass upon religious questions. Ah, Mr. President, would any Senator say that no court can enforce the provisions of our Constitution in favor of religious liberty? New sects are continually arising in our country, and the votaries of the religious views of those sects are at the beginning small and insignificant minorities. Questions regarding their rights as religious bodies, questions regarding their rights to freedom of worship and of expression, are protected by the provisions of our constitutions, and against the wish, against the prejudice, against the passion of the vast majority of the people, the courts, and the courts alone, can maintain the rights of the few to pursue the dictates of their own conscience rather than the will of the majority.

Sometimes questions arise upon those limitations which our constitutions impose upon the action of legislatures and executive officers and people alike by those great rules that protect liberty and property against the power of government wherever it be vested.

Now, sir, picture to yourselves a judge before whom one of these cases is brought. A few people, a single man, is upon one side. The powers of a government are upon the other side. For the few and the weak there stand only the rules of law. Upon the other side stands the public desire to have a decision in accordance with the public interest or the public feeling. Picture to yourselves the judge who is called upon to decide one of those cases, and consider what his frame of mind and condition of feeling must be when he knows that if he decides against public feeling immediately a recall petition will be signed and filed, and the great body of the people against whose wish he has ruled will be called upon, will be required, to vote whether they prefer him to some man who has never offended public opinion.

Upon all these cases, sir, so far as they depend upon evidence—and a vast majority of them do depend upon evidence—which is produced in the trial and which enters into the record of the case, the public does not see the record. It receives its information from the press. I beg the Senate to recall the reports of trials and arguments in our courts which they have been accustomed to see in the public press. The conditions of newspaper enterprise do not permit the publication of the full record of any trial. The gentlemen of the press, eager to secure items of news that will be interesting to the readers of their papers, catch upon the spectacular and interesting and startling incidents of the trial and reproduce them in their columns.

The judge is to pass upon the evidence that appears in the record, but he is to be judged upon the newspaper reports of the trial. And to whom, sir, will the judge try that case? To whom will counsel argue that case? What will become of that spirit which pervades every true court of justice, in which the facts as ascertained and the law interpreted and these alone form the basis of judgment? Is it in human nature that a judge, sitting under such circumstances as are exhibited by this provision which I have read, shall do other than try his case rather to the reporters than to his conscience, to his knowledge of the law, and to his understanding of the facts? For at every step the judge is upon trial. His defense will not come when he has the opportunity to put 200 words of justification onto the ballot. His defense will begin with the first step in the trial of the cause. Human nature can not work otherwise. In all these great cases of public interest the judge will be on trial on the newspaper record, and in that trial he will take a far deeper interest than in the trial of the defendant or in the rights of the parties upon the record of the court.

Let me illustrate the way in which this provision is bound to work by reading from a newspaper called the People's Paper, published in Los Angeles, Cal., Saturday, April 15, 1911. In large black letters:

Aroused people to recall judge.

In large, but not so large black letters below:

Los Angeles will be first to use new law and oust union persecutor from the bench.

In large black letters, but still not so large:

To recall Judge Joseph Chambers for persecuting union strikers is now the declared purpose of Los Angeles Socialists and union men, who assert that immediately upon the passage of the State recall amendment Chambers will be the first judge in California to receive the attention of an aroused people, determined to oust him from the bench.

The recall petition will set forth that this judge raised the bail of three union men, John Crelly, R. L. Murray, and Isaac Libby, from the usual $50 to the outrageous sum of $300 per man; that the maximum fine for their alleged offense of picketing is but $50, and therefore in making their bonds six times as large as the highest possible fine Chambers must have determined to punish the strikers before a jury could have an opportunity to declare them innocent.

Why a judge on the bench, the petition will recite, should have thus made himself an open partisan of the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association can only be explained by the fact that out of the 310 metal trades mechanics, brewery workers, and other union strikers arrested and taken to the police court only 4 convictions were obtained.

Plainly, the public and jurymen believed these men innocent.

Plainly, the judge concluded that if strikers were to be punished it must be done before trial.

The petition will then show that the average workingman has little money, as Chambers well knows, and therefore he practically attempted to harass them with imprisonment an unknown number of days in a vile jail awaiting trial by demanding of each striker $300 cash bail.

Mr. President, I do not know whether this recall petition which is outlined there was ever filed. I do not know what action was taken regarding it. I do not know whether the judge was right or wrong in fixing $300 as the amount of bail.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LIPPITT in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. ROOT. One moment, please. But I do not doubt that this paper illustrates, and well illustrates, what will be the inevitable course that will ensue upon the establishment of such a tenure of official office as is provided for by this constitutional provision.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I do not desire to antagonize anything that has been said by the Senator from New York, for I fully agree with the position he takes upon this question, but I do desire to say that there is yet no law in the State of California for the recall of judges.

Mr. ROOT. I am very glad to hear it.

Mr. WORKS. I desire to state further that in my judgment if the recall did exist in the county of Los Angeles, my home, there would be no danger of the judge referred to in this article being recalled on any such ground as is set forth in the newspaper.

Mr. ROOT. I am very glad to hear that also. As I have just said, I do not know whether any action was taken. It is evident no action was taken, because the law was not passed, but I have read this paper to illustrate the way in which the recall provision will be regarded by the people who have a deep interest in judicial action; and it is under the pressure of such attempts, if such a provision is adopted, that every judge must administer justice in the causes which excite public interest and public passion. And those are the causes which test the strength and effectiveness of a system of administering justice.

In the year of the Declaration of Independence the temporary legislative body of Massachusetts undertook to frame a constitution for the State, and sent to the different towns of the State a request for their consent to the establishment of such a constitution. On the 1st of October, 1776, the people of Concord in their town meeting adopted a resolution refusing to accept a constitution so framed. Among their reasons they said that they refused "because we conceive that a constitution in its proper sense intends a system of principles established to secure the subject in the possession and enjoyment of the rights and privileges against any encroachment of the governing party." That reason applies, sir, whether the governing party be a king or a president or a legislature or the people at the polls. The Constitution in its just sense intends to secure the subject in the possession and enjoyment of his rights and privileges against any encroachments of the governing party.

The men who sent back that answer, that they would not accept a constitution framed by the legislature which ought to be restrained by the Constitution, were the very men who stood at Concord Bridge and had the courage to fire the first shots against the overwhelming power of England. I trust, sir, I believe, that the spirit of Concord, of 1776, has not died out among the American people, and that they are not yet ready to put the judge, who alone can maintain the rights of the citizen against the governing party, at the immediate mercy of the governing party. We are not yet ready to say to the judge whom we put upon the bench to maintain the great principles of justice, "You shall maintain them under the penalty of being deprived of your office and being disgraced for life if you oppose the will of the governing body."

Mr. President, I should not oppose the admission of Arizona with provisions in its proposed constitution which were of minor consequence, even though I did not agree with them. There are many provisions in this constitution which I think inexpedient and unwise. There are a number of provisions which I deeply regret to see incorporated in the constitution of any American State. But for all that I would not oppose the admission of Arizona as a State upon a constitution adopted by a vote of her people because it contained those provisions or because it contained any provision which did not seem to me to be fundamental in its character and to be in a considerable measure a negation of the true principles of our Government.

I conceive that this provision for the recall of judges is of that character. I think it goes to the very basis of our free Government, and I will proceed to state why I think it differs from the other provisions which I dislike. I have no quarrel with the gentlemen who extol the wisdom of the people. I believe that in the long run, after mature consideration and full discussion and when conclusions are reached under such circumstances as to exclude the interests or the prejudice or the passions of the moment, the decisions of the American people are sound and wise. But, sir, they are sound and wise because the wisdom of our fathers devised a system of government which does prevent our people from reaching their conclusions except upon mature consideration, after full discussion, and when the dictates of momentary passion or self-interest are excluded.

The framers of our Government were largely men who had been bred and had inherited deep religious convictions, and among those convictions was the realization of the fact that among all the virtues that it is incumbent upon men to cultivate and to seek the virtue of self-restraint stands one of the first. That view of human strength and weakness, sir, lies at the bottom of the religion which we all profess. Whatever be the creed, the denomination, the name underlying the religion of all of us, as it underlay the religions of the framers of our Government, is the knowledge that we are fallible, prone to evil, weak in the face of temptation, liable to go astray, and that we sorely need to restrain ourselves from the following of our own impulses by the rule of principles—principles of religion, principles of morality, principles of justice. We know that but for some ruling principle we are sure to err, and that our holding to the straight path depends upon our fidelity not to the impulse or the wish of the moment, but our fidelity to the principles that control our lives and conduct.

Many of the framers of the Republic were men who inherited the traditions of a theocratic government, in which men were controlled as against their own impulses and passions by the dictates that were handed down in the revelation from the Divine Ruler. In a belief which we can not gainsay to-day they undertook to establish for this Government a code of fundamental principles of justice, of equality, principles formulated in specific rules of conduct to make practical their application. Those principles we describe as the constitutional limitations of the National and the State constitutions:

No man shall be deprived of his property except by due process of law.

Private property shall not be taken for public use except upon due compensation.

No man shall be compelled to be a witness against himself.

No man shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense.

And all the others, that great array of the fundamental and essential principles by which the American Republic has imposed restraints upon itself against its own interest of the moment, its own wishes of the moment, its own prejudice and passion of the moment; that great array of the fundamental rules of justice, of liberty, of human rights, which I say the American Republic has imposed upon itself is the great secret of the success of the American experiment in government, the maintenance of justice and order, individual liberty and individual opportunity in this vast continent, among these 90,000,000 people. And for the maintenance of those rules of justice our fathers provided that the government which may seek, under the interest or the passion of the moment, to override them shall be withheld by the judgment of a body of public officers separated from the interests and passions of the hour, with no pride of opinion because of having made a law, with no lust for power because of a desire to execute a law, with a strong hand according to individual opinion as to what may be best; but impartial, sworn only to the administration of justice, without interest, without fear, and without favor. They intrusted the maintenance of these rules to a body of judges, who were to speak the voice of justice without fear of punishment or hope of reward.

It is the establishment of this system of rules, fundamental rules, intrusted for their declaration and maintenance to a body of impartial judges, that is the great contribution of America to the political science of the world, the great contribution of America to the art of self-government among men.

Why, Mr. President, was it necessary to establish these rules of right? Why should there be a provision in our constitutions which prevents the taking of private property for public use without compensation? Why should there be a provision that no man shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense? Why should there be a provision that no cruel or unusual punishment shall be inflicted, unless it be that the existence of such rules was deemed to be necessary and is deemed to be necessary to control the governmental power of the moment?

The essential difference, sir, between the establishment of one of these great rules of right conduct in a constitution and the enactment of a law either by a legislature or by a people is that the fundamental rule is established upon considerations of abstract justice. The rule is established when no one has any concrete interest to be affected, when no one is desirous of doing the wrong thing that the rule prohibits or of undoing the right thing that the rule maintains. It is then, sir, that the voice of an intelligent people is the voice of God, when upon considerations of justice, when considering what is right and fair, and makes for justice and liberty, a people establish for their own control and restraint a rule of right; and the abstract rule is necessary because when the concrete interest comes into play, because when the passion of the moment comes into play, because when religious feeling is rife, when political feeling is excited, when the desire for power here or the desire to push forward a propaganda of views here comes into play, then the inherent weakness of human nature makes it certain that the great and fundamental principles of right will be disregarded.

Sir, we see every day legislatures of our States passing laws which are in violation of these fundamental rules. We see every day public officers exercising an arrogant power in violation of the fundamental rules, except as they are restrained by the cold and impartial voice of those tribunals that our people have established to assert the control of the principles of justice over the interests and the passions of the moment.

Mr. President, this provision for the recall of judges strikes at the very heart of that fundamental and essential characteristic of our system of government. It nullifies it; it sets it at naught; it casts to the winds that protection of justice that our fathers established and that has made us with all our power a just and orderly people. For, sir, when we say to the judge upon the bench, who is bound to assert the rules of justice established in a constitution long years before for the restraint of the people in their passion or their prejudice, you shall decide for the rules of justice at your peril; when we say to the judge if you maintain the abstract rule of justice against the wish of the people at the moment you shall be turned out of office in ignominy, we nullify the rule of justice and we establish the rule of the passion, prejudice, and interest of the moment.

So, sir, I say that this provision of the Arizona constitution strikes at the very heart of our system of government. It goes deeper than that. This provision, sir, is not progress, it is not reform; it is degeneracy. It is a movement backward to those days of misrule and unbridled power out of which the world has been slowly progressing under the leadership of those great men who established the Constitution of the United States. It is a move backward to those days when human passion and the rule of men obtained rather than the law and the rule of principles, for it ignores, it sets at naught the great principle of government and of civilized society, the principle that justice is above majorities.

I care not how small may be the numbers of a political faith or a religious sect, I care not how weak and humble may be a single man accused of however atrocious a crime, time was when the feelings and the passions and the wish of a majority determined his rights and oftentimes his right to life; but now, in this twentieth century, with all the light of the civilization of our times, after a century and a quarter passed by this great and free people following the footsteps of Washington, Hamilton, Jefferson, and Madison, now with all the peoples of the world following their footsteps in the establishment of constitutional governments, the hand of a single man appealing to that justice which exists independently of all majorities has a power that we can not ignore or deny but at the sacrifice of the best and the noblest elements of government.

There is such a thing as justice, and though the greatest and most arrogant majority unite to override it, God stands behind it, the eternal laws that rule the world maintain it, and if we attempt to make the administration and award of justice dependent upon the will of a majority we shall fail, and we shall fail at the cost of humiliation and ignominy to ourselves.

I do not envy the men who prefer the uncontrolled rule of a majority free from the restraints which we have imposed upon ourselves to the system of orderly government that we have now established. I do not envy the men who would rather have the French constituent convention, controlled by Marat and Danton and Robespierre, than to have a Supreme Court presided over by Marshall; who would rather have conclusions upon a question of justice reached by a popular election on the basis of newspaper reports than to have the impartial judgment of a great court. I do not envy the men who have no sympathy with Louis XVI against the dictates of the majority of the French Malesherbes and De Sèze pleading for the lawful rights of capital in 1793.

I do not envy the men who see nothing to admire in John Adams defending the British soldiers against the protests of his neighbors and friends and countrymen after the Boston massacre. Rather, sir, would I feel that my country loves justice and possesses that divine power of self-restraint without which the man remains the child, the citizen remains the savage, and the community becomes the commune; that my country has carried into its system of law, and, whatever be its wish for the moment, whatever its prejudice, whatever its passion for the moment, will forever maintain as of greater importance than any single issue or any single man or any single interest that reverence for the eternal principles of justice which we have embedded in our fundamental law as our nearest approach to the application of the Divine command to human affairs.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I do not intend to take up the time of the Senate in any general, extended, academic, or historical discussion of the subject. My aim will be rather to explain to the Senate in a brief manner the scope of the amendment which I have offered as a substitute for the pending joint resolution. In order that the merits of the amendment may be fully understood, I shall briefly call your attention to some of the legislative history relating to the subject.

By the act of June 20, 1910, commonly called the enabling act, authority was given to the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico to elect delegates for a constitutional convention to formulate a constitution, and to submit it for ratification to a vote of the people. The enabling act provided that the constitutional convention of New Mexico should consist of 100 members and that of Arizona of 52 members. It further provided that after the constitutions had been formulated and adopted by the respective conventions the constitutions were to be submitted to a vote of the people of the respective Territories for ratification; and if the constitution in each case was approved by a majority of the votes cast on that subject, then the constitutions were to be submitted to the President of the United States and to Congress for approval; and if Congress and the President approved of the constitutions, or if the President approved the same and Congress failed to disapprove the same during the next regular session, then the President was to certify such facts to the governor of each Territory, who then was directed to call an election for State, county, and legislative officers and Representatives in Congress; and when the result of such election was certified to the President it became his duty to issue his proclamation of the result, which proclamation admitted the Territories as States into the Union.

The approval of the constitution is a prerequisite to the holding of an election for the officers mentioned, and it is only after such elections have been held that the Territories are to be admitted into the Union; in other words, the mere approval of the constitution does not admit the Territory, but such approval must be followed by an election for these several officers—State, legislative, and county, and Members of the House of Representatives. After such election has been held, then the President issues his proclamation, and thereupon the Territories are admitted into the Union on a footing with the other States.

The constitution of New Mexico was ratified by a much larger vote than that of Arizona. As to the vote of New Mexico, I quote the following from the speech of Attorney General Wickersham, recently delivered before the law school of Yale University:

> The returns of the Thirteenth Census gave New Mexico in 1910 a total population of 327,301, of which 76,233 were native-born males over 21 years of age and 4,269 naturalized foreign-born males over 21 years of age, making an apparent total voting population of 80,502. There were cast for the constitution 31,742 votes, against it 13,399 votes, or a total of 45,141 on the question of its adoption, being about 56 per cent of the total number of the qualified voters and slightly less than 14 per cent of the total population.

There is a marked contrast between the action of the people of New Mexico in voting upon their constitution and the action of the people of Arizona in voting on their constitution. I read from the same speech on this subject:

> The returns of the Thirteenth Census give Arizona in 1910 a total population of 204,354, of which 155,550 are native born and 48,804 foreign born. Of this population, 118,576 are males and 85,778 are females. The total number of white males over 21 years of age is 65,133, of which number 39,427 are native born and 5,896 naturalized citizens, so that the total voting population is apparently 45,323.

I call the attention of Senators to the figures—

> There were cast for the constitution 12,187 votes, against it 3,822 votes, or a total of 16,009 on the question of its adoption, being about 35 per cent of the total number of qualified voters, and slightly less than 8 per cent of the total population.

The election for the ratification of the constitution of New Mexico was held on the 21st day of January, 1911; and the election for the ratification of the constitution of Arizona was held on the 9th day of February, 1911. Both constitutions were sent to the President and to Congress for approval in the latter part of February, 1911.

The constitution of New Mexico was approved by the President in his message to Congress of February 24, 1911, wherein he recommended the approval of the same by Congress. The constitution of Arizona has not up to this time been approved by the President. So that at this moment the constitution of New Mexico stands here before Congress as approved by the President, while the constitution of Arizona stands here without the approval of the President. As to New Mexico then, if Congress at its next regular session does not disapprove the constitution it stands approved, and when this is followed by an election of the officers mentioned the Territory will be admitted into the Union.

In the case of Arizona, the President not having approved the constitution, it operates as a stay of proceedings until Congress passes an act approving the constitution, for until such approval there can be no election and no admission.

This brings me, Mr. President, to the joint resolution which has passed the House and is now before the Senate. That joint resolution—and I give it in outline—provides that the constitution of New Mexico shall be approved after the people of that Territory have had another vote on article 19 of the constitution. That is the article relating to constitutional amendments. It is claimed and insisted that that article relating to amendments to the constitution is too conservative, too restrictive, and that it ought to be again submitted to the people for their vote. I want to call the attention of Senators to that constitution. It is not as restrictive as is claimed by many; it is not any more restrictive than our Federal Constitution. Article 19 reads in part as follows:

SECTION 1. Any amendment or amendments to this constitution may be proposed in either house of the legislature at any regular session thereof, and if two-thirds of all members elected to each of the two houses, voting separately, shall vote in favor thereof, such proposed amendment or amendments shall be entered on their respective journals with the yeas and nays thereon; or any amendment or amendments to this constitution may be proposed at the first regular session of the legislature held after the expiration of two years from the time this constitution goes into effect, or at the regular session of the legislature convening each eighth year thereafter, and if a majority of all the members elected to each of the two houses voting separately at said sessions shall vote in favor thereof, such proposed amendment or amendments shall be entered on their respective journals with the yeas and nays thereon.

In other words, at any regular session two-thirds of each house of the legislature of the State, each house voting separately, may propose amendments, the same as in the case of the Federal Constitution, while a mere majority may propose amendments after the lapse of two years and every eight years thereafter. In either case, Mr. President, whether a constitutional amendment be adopted under the first provision or under the second, it is submitted to a vote of the people, and if ratified by a majority of the electors voting thereon, and by an affirmative vote of not less than 40 per cent of all the votes cast at said election in the State and in at least one-half of the counties thereof, then such amendment becomes a part of the constitution. No more than three amendments shall be submitted at the same election.

Sections 1 and 3 of article 7, relating to the elective franchise, and sections 8 and 10 of article 12, relating to education, can not be amended unless the amendment is proposed by three-fourths of the members of each house of the legislature. These restrictions in the case of these sections and articles are for the benefit and protection of the large Mexican population. Mr. President, the provision in the constitution requiring amendments to be ratified by a 40 per cent vote in at least one-half of the counties of the State was, it was explained to the committee by representatives from New Mexico, inserted for the benefit and protection and in behalf of the poor Mexicans. Nearly half of the people of that Territory are of Mexican or of Spanish descent. They were the early and original settlers of that country. They have adopted a different system of irrigation and reclamation of their arid lands from that which generally prevails. They operate through a sort of community system, which is different from that employed by the rest of the population; and this provision was put into the constitution in order to protect them, so that no violent changes could be made. The constitution is very careful to protect the Mexicans. It provides, as I have already stated—that no amendment shall apply to or affect the provisions of sections 1 and 3 of article 7 hereof on elective franchise unless proposed by not less than three-fourths of the votes of each house of the legislature.

This is to prevent the Mexicans from being disfranchised for not speaking the English language.

The restriction and exception as to sections 8 and 10 of article 12 are for the purpose of preventing the exclusion of the Spanish language from the public schools. In other words, the Spanish language is to be taught side by side with the English language in the public schools; and all this is for the benefit of the Mexicans who are not up to the standard of the rest of the population in the matter of the English language. I mean by that expression that they are not as well versed in the English language as are other citizens of the Territory. Many of them have a sprinkling of Indian blood in their veins, and they are descended from the old conquistadors who first explored that country. They are a quiet, law-abiding, good people, but, as I have said, they are not versed in the English language, and so this constitution of New Mexico was framed ex industria, Mr. President, to protect those people as they ought to be protected.

Compare this action of New Mexico in reference to these people with the action of Arizona, not as embodied in its constitution, but as found in its legislation. In 1909, on the 10th of March, the Legislature of Arizona passed an act that practically disfranchised all such people as these that have been taken care of by the New Mexican constitution.

I read section 1 of that law of 1909:

Every male citizen of the United States and every male citizen of Mexico who shall have elected to become a citizen of the United States under the treaty of peace exchanged and ratified at Queretaro on the 30th day of May, 1848, and the Gadsden treaty of 1854, of the age of 21 years, who shall have been a resident of the Territory one year next preceding the election, and of the county and precinct in which he claims his vote, 30 days, and who, not being prevented by physical disability from so doing, is able to read the Constitution of the United States in the English language in such manner as to show he is neither prompted nor reciting from memory, and to write his name * * * should be entitled to vote at all elections, etc.

This is the way Arizona treated the Mexicans in their midst—practically disfranchise them. In the enabling act which we passed, we provided that the old election law of 1901, which did not contain these restrictions, should apply in the matter of the election of delegates to the constitutional convention and in the manner of the ratification of the constitution.

I have called attention to this, Mr. President, for the purpose of showing the extreme care with which the people of New Mexico have provided that no injustice either in respect to education or in respect to the electoral franchise shall by any means be inflicted upon those Mexicans who constitute half of the population.

I am told that upward of 25 or 30 per cent of the permanent population of Arizona belong to the Mexican class of people, but you look in vain for any restriction in the constitution of Arizona against such legislation as that act of 1909, and that law still remains.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. I have not had the good fortune to hear all the Senator's speech, so he may have alluded to or said something about that as to which I desire to ask him. Do I understand the Senator to say that in the proposed New Mexico constitution there is no discrimination against the Spanish-speaking people?

Mr. NELSON. There is no discrimination against them.

Mr. BACON. I will read from the report of the House committee to see whether or not I am correct. On page 5 I find this language:

The committee has also provided in said proposed substitute that the enabling act of June 20, 1910, shall be amended by making section 5 of said act so read as to remove the disqualification imposed upon the Spanish-American population of New Mexico who can not read, write, and speak the English language for holding State offices, including membership in the legislature of the new State. No just reason is found for such disqualification.

The evidence before the committee was that these Spanish-American citizens are eager for education and largely now speak the English language, and strive to advance the teaching of English to their children in all of their public schools, but that this provision of the enabling act is regarded by them as a reflection upon them and their race. They have at all times supported by their votes and the imposition of taxes the developing of the public-school system of New Mexico. They are largely an agricultural people, frugal, industrious, and earnest supporters of every movement intended to advance the progress, prosperity, and civilization of New Mexico.

Again, it was suggested that this disqualification violates the spirit and the letter of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, entered into on the 2d day of February, 1848, by the terms of which the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona were for the most part acquired.

And then it goes on and quotes from the treaty.

Mr. NELSON. Unfortunately, that does not tally with the actual constitution. Let me read section 3 of article 7 relative to the elective franchise. It reads:

SEC. 3. The right of any citizen of the State to vote, hold office, or sit upon juries shall never be restricted, abridged, or impaired on account of religion, race, language, or color, or inability to speak, read, or write the English or Spanish languages, except as may be otherwise provided in this constitution; and the provisions of this section and of section 1 of this article shall never be amended except upon a vote of the people of this State in an election at which at least three-fourths of the electors voting in the whole State and at least two-thirds of those voting in each county of the State shall vote for such amendment.

Mr. BACON. Very well. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. NELSON. Now, I will call attention in that connection to other paragraphs of the constitution relating to education, and the Senator will see that that report does not do justice to the constitution. Section 8 of article 12, relating to education, provides:

SEC. 8. The legislature shall provide for the training of teachers in the normal schools or otherwise, so that they may become proficient in both the English and Spanish languages, to qualify them to teach Spanish-speaking pupils and students in the public schools and educational institutions of the State, and shall provide proper means and methods to facilitate the teaching of the English language and other branches of learning to such pupils and students.

And section 10 of the same article provides as follows:

SEC. 10. Children of Spanish descent in the State of New Mexico shall never be denied the right and privilege of admission and attendance in the public schools or other public educational institutions of the State, and they shall never be classed in separate schools, but shall forever enjoy perfect equality with other children in all public schools and educational institutions of the State, and the legislature shall provide penalties for the violation of this section. This section shall never be amended except upon a vote of the people of this State, in an election at which at least three-fourths of the electors voting in the whole State and at least two-thirds of those voting in each county in the State shall vote for such amendment.

I have called attention to these two articles of the constitution, one relating to the elective franchise and the other relating to the education of the people; both of them aimed to take special care and make due provision for the Mexicans or those of Spanish descent who speak that language.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. BACON. With the permission of the learned Senator, I want to call his attention to the provision that I spoke of before in order that he may see that his reply does not cover this provision. The reply of the Senator to the inquiry made by me was to read sections with regard to education and with regard to the elective franchise.

Mr. NELSON. I quoted them.

Mr. BACON. But the disqualification which the House committee criticizes in its report is the disqualification from office holding. That is what it says:

Shall be amended by making section 5 of said act so read as to remove the disqualification imposed upon the Spanish-American population of New Mexico who can not read, write, and speak the English language for holding State offices, including membership in the legislature of the new State.

I have not the constitution before me, but here is the plain language of the House report, and I presume they would scarcely have incorporated that statement unless it was buttressed by the facts. So that, if it be true that the constitution of Arizona discriminates unjustly or the laws of the Territory of Arizona discriminate unjustly against the Spanish-speaking people of Arizona, it is also true, perhaps in a less degree, that there is discrimination of the same kind in the constitution of New Mexico against the Spanish-speaking people, to the extent that they are not allowed to hold any office unless they can read the English language.

Mr. NELSON. The report from which the Senator is reading seems to refer to the enabling bill or act and not to the constitution. I can not find any provision in the constitution that restricts them from holding office.

Mr. BACON. I think, possibly, from the language——

Mr. NELSON. I can not find any restriction in the constitution, and as a matter of fact they have been holding office there all this time—county offices and Territorial offices and judicial offices—and proceedings both in the legislature and in the courts are carried on in both languages.

Now, there are no such provisions in the Arizona constitution—nothing of that kind—to protect the Spanish-speaking people, the Mexicans, either in an educational way or in the matter of the elective franchise.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. NELSON. I do; but I should like to answer a question.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. NELSON. I do not like a long interruption. I am willing to answer a question, but I do not like to have a whole speech injected into mine.

Now, Mr. President, on the theory that article 19 of the New Mexico constitution, relative to amendments of the constitution, was too conservative and too restrictive, in the joint resolution that passed the House it is provided that that question should again be submitted to the voters of New Mexico; but according to the joint resolution, whether the people of New Mexico vote that article in or out, the constitution stands approved anyway. So that it is a mere formal matter. It is not a sine qua non as to the approval of the constitution. The condition is that they must have another election, and if in that election they disapprove that paragraph of the constitution, it goes out; if they approve it, it remains in; and the constitution, in either event, is approved; and they will have to go on and hold their election and elect their officers—county, State, legislative, and congressional—and upon such election the Territory is admitted into the Union as a State.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. BACON. I do not wish to intrude on the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I trust the Senator did not take offense at what I said before. I am always glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. BACON. I simply desire to call the Senator's attention to the provision of the constitution of New Mexico which he could not find. He will find it on page 42, at the bottom of the page, numbered section 5. I will read it:

This State shall never enact any law restricting or abridging the right of suffrage on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and, in compliance with the requirements of the said act of Congress, it is hereby provided that ability to read, write, speak, and understand the English language sufficiently well to conduct the duties of the office without the aid of an interpreter shall be a necessary qualification for all State officers and members of the State legislature.

Mr. NELSON. That is only restriction on office holding. That is, if they hold an office of that character or that grade, they are required to speak the English language sufficiently to be understood. But there is no limitation as to proceedings in the courts. For years proceedings in the courts of New Mexico have been carried on in both languages—in Spanish and in English. Counsel have had interpreters to interpret their speeches to the jury. Courts have had interpreters to interpret their charges. Interpreters have interpreted not only the testimony of witnesses, but they have actually entered into the jury box and remained with the jury while they were agreeing upon their verdict, to interpret between the Spanish-speaking and the English-speaking members of the jury.

What I have said in reference to education and the right of suffrage remains undisputed. The constitution has taken particular pains to protect those Mexicans in their right of suffrage, and the same has taken place in reference to educational facilities.

The only restriction in the constitution is the paragraph that the Senator from Georgia quoted in relation to holding State offices. There they are required to speak the English language sufficiently to be understood, but there is nothing to bar them from holding office otherwise if they can speak that language.

Article 19 of the constitution relates to amendments, to which I have referred. Many ask why do you require those amendments to be ratified by a majority of the counties? That is for the purpose of protecting those Mexicans who occupy a certain number of counties in that proposed State. If you left it to a general vote of the proposed State, requiring 40 per cent of the entire vote of the State and a majority of all votes cast, that many votes might be secured in what they call the American counties, and the Mexican counties would be entirely outvoted and left in the cold.

The New Mexico constitution, and I want to call your attention to it, has no initiative, as we understand it. It has the referendum; that is, an act of the legislature may be vetoed, may, by a referendum, a petition, be vetoed by a majority vote, equal to at least 40 per cent of the people voting on that subject.

There is no recall of judges, no initiative. The only innovation upon the ordinary customary methods that we have in the older States is in the matter of the referendum.

Now, come to the case of Arizona. In the joint resolution, as it came from the House, a provision was inserted that Arizona should have another election upon the question of the adoption of article 8 of their constitution—that part of their article which provides for the recall of judges and all other officers. But under the provision of the House joint resolution, whether the people of Arizona voted that paragraph of the constitution out or kept it in the constitution, the constitution in any event would stand approved. If a majority vote is against that paragraph of the constitution, it will be eliminated. If a majority were against elimination, it would still remain a part of the constitution.

Mr. President, to my mind there are a number of objectionable features in that constitution which as an original question I could never approve. For instance, the constitution of Arizona may be amended upon the petition of 15 per cent of the votes cast at the last election. A constitution is a fundamental law, bounding the scope of the legislative, executive, and judicial departments. Its object is to lay down the outlines of the State government, to place an embargo against popular clamor, and to keep legislation within well-defined channels. In other words, it is a bulwark against hasty and ill-advised legislation. Under this Arizona constitution 10 per cent of the voters can invoke the action of the people upon a statute. Ten per cent of the vote can initiate legislation, and 15 per cent of the vote can initiate a constitutional amendment; and if the majority of those voting upon that subject amount to 40 per cent of the total vote, it may adopt the constitutional amendment.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that that is a very objectionable feature to the constitution, but I will waive that. Then there is another article of the constitution relating to the recall of officers. All officers, executive, legislative, and judicial, can be recalled, and a member of the legislature can be recalled. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] called the attention of the Senate to that the other day. When a member has been elected to the legislature, five days after his election a petition can be circulated for his recall. As the Senator from Idaho pointed out, how easy it would be for political demagogues or those who had an axe to grind and who wanted to defeat the election of a United States Senator to have enough of those petitions filed so that the legislature would be without a quorum. After the lapse of five days after an election a petition for recall can be filed against every one of them.

But the most iniquitous part of the constitution to my mind, and I can not call it by any other term, is the recall of judges. I call it iniquitous for the reason that there is something more than a mere recall in it. If the mere question were submitted to the voters as to whether the judge has been competent and faithful to his trust, and the vote were only cast upon that question, the judge might have something of a show—might have a fair chance, but this article is cunningly devised so that when a petition is filed for the recall there is another election, and the man who six months before had been elected a judge must submit to a new campaign and a new election. For aught we know it may be only a question of another candidate seeking the office, perhaps one of the defeated candidates, or perhaps some man who is a little more in popular favor.

The question will be passed upon, not whether the judge in office has offended against the law, not whether he has been unfaithful to his trust, but the question will be whether the voters like B or C better than Judge A, the incumbent. So you see that the judge who has been elected for the period of six years can, after the expiration of six months of his term, be removed by a new election. Six years is the term of office, barring the first election, of the judges of the supreme court. The first judges of the supreme court are to be elected for the same term as the first governor, and the man who receives the greatest number of votes is to be chief justice. After that, at the next general election, three judges—the number the supreme court is composed of—are to be elected, and these three judges are by lot to determine which one of them is to hold for six years, which one for four years, and which one for two years; thereafter a judge is elected every two years for a term of six years.

You can readily see, Senators, that it may occur that a judge has been elected to office by a slender majority. He may be, as a lawyer, as a citizen, and as a judge, of the highest and best order, second to none, and may prove himself a good judge, but there is some other fellow, very popular with "the boys," who wants his place; there is some other man who would like to try again to secure the office, and, under the pretext of a recall, he secures a new election; so that judge who was elected for a term of six years is only sure of a six months' term and has to run the gantlet of a new election after the period of six months' service. In other words, instead of electing a judge for a definite term of six years, as the constitution in the first instance seems to contemplate, he is really elected for a sure term of six months, with no certainty as to the rest. After a six months' service he is subject to the whim and at the mercy of disappointed office seekers and disappointed litigants.

Mr. President, if this question of recall were submitted to the voters in a fair manner, if the question was submitted to the voters whether Judge A has been an honest and faithful judge, and if the vote were taken upon that question alone, divorced from the claims of rival candidates, the judge might have a fair show. But when you have, in connection with that, other candidates coming into the field—and there must be a new election—and if one of those other candidates happens to be more popular for the time being with the masses and gets one more vote than the judge against whom the recall petition is circulated, he is elected, and the judge goes out dishonored because he was defeated by a candidate who happens to be a little more popular. So you see that by a mere majority of one vote, through that system of new elections cunningly devised, a new man may be elected judge, not because the old judge is a dishonest judge, not because he is not a good lawyer and has not done his duty faithfully, but because, for the time being, the populace may think that the other man is a "better fellow." The cry will be, "Oh, we like him better; he is such a fine fellow. We have no objection to the old judge. While we are not prepared to say he has been dishonest, while we are not prepared to say that he has not interpreted the law fairly and justly, this new man is such a nice fellow, I think we had better have him for judge." So the operation can be repeated from time to time. The man who gets in in that way by one vote on the heels of the so-called discredited judge, in six months may have to run the gantlet for a still more popular fellow; and so you can have the operation repeated every six months. Enterprising and ambitious lawyers, looking the field over and wanting a place on the bench instead of a place at the bar, will be found ready to put the machinery of recall in motion, and a judge, however worthy and competent he may be, has at all times to stand ready to meet such attacks.

You and I, Senators, know how easy it is to get petitions signed for almost any purpose. There never was a man convicted of a great crime and sent to prison but that his friends could secure an abundance of signatures on a petition for a pardon or a commutation of his sentence.

But, Mr. President, look at the iniquity of the scheme from another standpoint, and I can not help calling it by that name: By this system you hold the sword of Damocles over every judge. Every judge has not only the question addressed to him of finding the facts and to determining the law of the case, but he must also consider whether his decision will meet with popular favor, for on that will hinge the question of retaining the office. He may decide the case justly and according to law, but if in the midst of great excitement public sentiment is against him, woe be unto him. It may be a case growing out of great political controversy. It may be a case of homicide, or it may be a case arising from a railroad wreck, a mine explosion, or a labor strike or controversy, where public sentiment may be wrought up to a high state of pressure and excitement; then the poor judge is confronted with the problem of deciding the case justly, according to the law and evidence, against the popular clamor and demand, and thus putting the term of his office in jeopardy, or of yielding to the "voice of the people" for the sake of holding the office, whatever the result to the litigants may be. The honest judge, the judge with a true moral sense and genuine stamina, will have no difficulty, but the weakling, the time server, the popular idol, the hale fellow well met, will cringe and fall down and worship the popular idol, for the "voice of the people" is to him higher than the voice of the law; it is his standard of infallibility.

"The facts of the case are thus and so; clear enough beyond all dispute, and the law of the case is clear enough, but what is the public sentiment on the case? Will the public approve of my judgment as to the facts? Will the public approve of my judgment as to the law?" What will the poor judge do when confronted by such a question, and the recall keeps that question constantly before him? If he is a mere politician, if he is a mere time server, if he is a moral weakling, if he is ready to pander to popular clamor he will frame his decision regardless of the intrinsic merits, so as to catch the approval of the public pulse. If he is an honest man, if he is a man of nerve, if he believes in a government of law and order, no matter what the public may clamor for or demand, he will decide according to the law and the evidence.

Senators, are we prepared to say that we want in this country instead of a government of law, a government that will be swayed and moved by every public emotion and clamor?

Mr. President, I can recall as a boy the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Chief Justice Taney, in the Dred Scott case, and what an excitement and feeling there was in the North over it. If we had had the "recall" as to Federal judges at that time, I have no doubt petitions would have been extensively circulated in the North for Justice Taney's recall. But Senators who know anything about American history know that, barring that decision, and on that we may well differ, he was one of the greatest lawyers and one of the ablest jurists who ever sat on the Supreme Court of the United States, second only to John Marshall.

I see before me my genial friend from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. He has introduced a bill for the recall of Federal judges and if the bill passes we will have the recall of judges in such cases as that to which I refer. I can remember how disappointed many of our people were when the Supreme Court announced its decision in the legal-tender case. I can remember how disappointed our people were when the Supreme Court held the income-tax provision of the tariff act of 1894 unconstitutional.

In all those cases, I dare say, it would have been an easy thing to have circulated petitions and secured abundant signers for the recall of those judges. But what a judicial system would you have in this country, State or Federal, if you had a system where, whenever a litigant was disappointed, wherever the public, fed by muckraking newspapers and magazines, were disappointed, at the mere whim of such a sentiment manufactured and created, you could displace a faithful official? What kind of a government would you have? Would you have a government of law and order, or would you have an emotional government, moving about according to the impulses and emotions of the people, misled and misinformed by a press pandering to the basest impulses of human nature and not according to the principle of our Constitution and laws?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. I merely want to call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to the tremendous historical fact that the Dred Scott decision, nationalizing slavery without the possibility of amending the Constitution, left no alternative as a remedy except a dissolution of the Union or war, and it led directly to war because there was no control over that judiciary.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I do not want to kindle any of the embers of that war. I only referred to the instance of Chief Justice Taney to illustrate my argument. There is no occasion to go any further into the subject, and I will not follow the Senator in that matter.

Mr. OWEN. If the Senator will go a little further he will see the necessity of it.

Mr. NELSON. Why do we have such constitutional provisions as those the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] cited a moment ago? Why do we have such provisions in our laws and constitutions providing for the protection of life, liberty, and property? We have them as a bar and protection against popular clamor and popular demand; we have them for the protection of the meek, the humble, and the lowly; we have them for the protection of the individual against the masses; we have them that popular outcry may not smother the voice of justice; and any judge on the bench who neglects his duty in that respect, in maintaining the principles of our laws and our constitutions, no matter what the popular clamor may be, is unfaithful to his trust, and ought not to remain in office.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. REED. I did not understand the remark of the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. NELSON. Perhaps the Senator had better wait until I get through, and then I will give him 15 or 20 minutes to answer me. Now, what do I propose by this substitute?

Mr. REED. I will be glad to wait, and I have not any doubt it will be more fortunate for the Senator if I do wait.

Mr. NELSON. The substitute I propose is to approve the constitution of New Mexico as it comes before us without any question. I regard that provision of the constitution of New Mexico, article 18, relating to amendments as fairly conservative and proper, and there is no occasion for submitting that question again to the people.

In respect to Arizona I provide by this amendment that the question shall be again submitted to the people as to the recall of judges. In other words, the amendment does not propose to interfere with the recall of any other officer; it is limited strictly to judicial officers. I framed the amendment so that if the people of Arizona eliminate the recall of judges at the election for State, county, and legislative officers and Representatives in Congress, provided for in the substitute, at substantially the same time as in the case of New Mexico, the constitution of Arizona, like that of New Mexico, stands approved. If the recall of judges is eliminated from the constitution at that election, Arizona will come into the Union at the same time as New Mexico. If my substitute is adopted and becomes a law, the President must at once notify the governors of Arizona and New Mexico, and they must, within 30 days, order and give notice of such election for State, county, judicial, and legislative officers and Members of Congress; and such election must be held not less than 60 days nor more than 90 days after notice, and when the results of such elections are certified by the governors to the President of the United States, it is his duty, by proclamation, to declare the Territories admitted into the Union as States on a footing of equality with the other States.

Now, in respect to Arizona, I call the attention of Senators to the top of page 3. In order that the election for State officers and for the amendment of the constitution in reference to the recall of judges may take place at the same time as in New Mexico, I have stricken out, in line 4, page 3, the words "within 30 days" and inserted the word "immediately," so that it will read:

> That immediately after the passage of this resolution and its approval by the President, the President shall certify the fact to the governor of Arizona, who shall, within 30 days after the receipt of such certificate from the President, issue his proclamation for an election by the qualified voters of Arizona, to be held not earlier than 60 nor later than 90 days thereafter.

That leaves it exactly the same as in the case of New Mexico. If the substitute passes the constitution of New Mexico is approved; and then it is the duty of the President to call the attention of the governor of New Mexico to the fact, who within 30 days issues his proclamation and an election is held.

The word "immediately" is not in the paragraph relating to the constitution of New Mexico. It simply says the President shall give notice after the law is passed. In order to insure the fact that the election for State officers in Arizona shall take place at the same time as in New Mexico, I have put in the word "immediately," so that if the people of Arizona at their election for State, county, legislative, and congressional officers eliminate the paragraph of the constitution providing for the recall of judges they will come into the Union exactly at the same time as New Mexico.

That is my ambition, Mr. President. I feel friendly to Arizona. Some years ago I thought, as some of the older Senators will remember, that Arizona and New Mexico were not ripe for statehood. I think they are now.

The question of politics has never cut any figure with me, Mr. President, but I have a pride in our system of government; I want to maintain its integrity; and I do not want the Congress of the United States to set a bad example in the case of Arizona.

It is said that this constitution is republican in form. It is true that in one sense it is, but in respect to the recall of judicial officers it is entirely different from and not in harmony with the Constitution of the United States.

I was very much interested in the scholarly, exhaustive, and interesting argument of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who seemed, in the main, to look upon the judicial office and the duties of the judiciary as I do, but who said that on account of the principle of self-government we ought to waive our objections and vote for the admission of Arizona anyway. Under the Constitution the Congress of the United States has the power to prescribe under what conditions new States shall be admitted. That power in years gone by, as we all know, was exercised in admitting certain States of the North and admitting certain States of the South. Time and time again Congress has exercised that power. We have a right to say under what conditions Arizona shall come into the Union. What I insist upon, Mr. President, is that while we have this power we shall not stultify ourselves and set an evil example to the whole country and say we will admit Arizona with this judicial recall provision in her constitution. It is to this feature of the case that I have invoked your attention. Had we not better, as legislators, take a broad ground and look upon this question in its intrinsic merits, both in respect to the future and in respect to the past? Had we not better look at this question in the broadest sense and do to Arizona as we should want done to our own States? If this question came before the State of Minnesota—the State that has been my home for 40 years—if the legislature of that State should propose to enact such a recall law as there is in this Arizona constitution, I would oppose it, Mr. President, with all my might. I should oppose it in the interest of law and order and in the interest of good government.

I have faith to believe that if this question is again submitted to the people of Arizona they will have the good sense to eliminate this provision from their constitution. A very slight vote was cast at the last election, much less than half, not much more than 35 per cent of the entire vote. Very little interest was taken in the matter. If this question goes back and the people of Arizona are told, "You can come into the Union; we will receive you with a free hand, but we want you to eliminate this recall of judges," I have faith enough to believe that the people of Arizona will accept that condition and that Arizona will come into the Union as a State just at the same time that the Territory of New Mexico will come into the Union as a State.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. NELSON. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I have listened to this discussion with a great deal of interest. I happened to be out just at the moment that the Senator from Minnesota made some statement in respect to the irrigation laws of New Mexico having something to do with the amendment of the constitution. Would the Senator, for my benefit, restate his position in that regard?

Mr. NELSON. I will restate it, and I will state it in accordance with statements which were made before the committee. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY], and other Senators will bear witness to the fact that the claim was made that those of Spanish descent in New Mexico, the so-called Mexicans, had a different system of irrigation from others; that they had a sort of community system. I did not go into details to ascertain in just what particulars it differed from the other system, but such was the case, and that was the statement made before our committee by two or three gentlemen from New Mexico.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I can hardly understand how that condition of things could exist to such an extent as to affect the rights of individuals to the use of water under the laws as they exist in New Mexico. I am fairly familiar with the irrigation laws as they exist in the Western States. There are two means of acquiring title to water. One is by the purchase of land to which the water is appurtenant as a part of the land. That is the old common-law rule of riparian rights.

Mr. NELSON. I understand that; but I want to correct the Senator. That is not the question. The doctrine of prior appropriation to which the Senator is about to refer——

Mr. WORKS. Yes; I am coming to that.

Mr. NELSON. Prevails in that Territory; but the difference is that in New Mexico among the Spaniards they have a community system. They operate in communities in appropriating the water.

Mr. WORKS. Yes; undoubtedly they have in respect not only to the Spaniards or the New Mexicans, but also with respect to the Americans as well, because that system of taking out the water from the stream is quite common all over the Western States. I am, however, unable to see why that should have anything to do with the question of admitting the Territory of New Mexico or why it should have anything whatever to do with the question of the amendment of the constitution. That was what I was trying to arrive at.

Mr. NELSON. It has nothing to do with the question of admitting New Mexico, but that was one of the reasons that were given before the committee for the provision of the constitution which provided for the adoption of the amendment in the majority of the counties.

Now, to ease the conscience of the Senator, I think I will quote from Thomas Jefferson on this question. I had almost forgotten it.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator does not mean on the irrigation question?

Mr. NELSON. Oh, no; but on the question of submitting the matter and requiring a majority in certain counties. I will refer to what Thomas Jefferson said. He is quoted by Attorney General Wickersham in his speech before the students at Yale University. Speaking on that subject, he said:

> Jefferson's proposed constitution for Virginia contained a provision that none of the fundamental laws and principles of government should be repealed or altered but by the personal consent of the people at meetings held in the respective counties, the people of two-thirds of the counties to give their suffrage for any particular alteration.
> This Jeffersonian theory of making the alteration of the constitution dependent not only upon a certain percentage of the vote cast, but upon the consent of a specified percentage of the geographical subdivisions of the State, as we have seen, is embodied in the proposed constitution of New Mexico. The first constitution of Georgia required the consent of a majority of the counties to any amendment.

I have read this to show the Senator from California that that provision of the constitution of New Mexico is not a novel one; that it has precedents; that it has met the approval of that great leader of the Democracy, Thomas Jefferson; and it seems to me, Mr. President, where we have the approval of a man like Thomas Jefferson, I, at least, one of the pygmies of this generation, can certainly acquiesce in the doctrine and faith of Thomas Jefferson.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NELSON. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have looked in vain for any provision in the New Mexican constitution which requires that the English language shall be taught in the public schools. Does the Senator from Minnesota, who is a member of the committee, recall any provision that could be construed so as to require the English language to be taught in the public schools maintained at public expense?

Mr. NELSON. Oh, yes; there is an educational provision.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have looked at the educational provision, but I do not find that it provided that the English language should be taught in the public schools.

Mr. NELSON. Those provisions are in the laws of the Territory, and they have always been the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. No. When New Mexico was making a constitution in 1889 the people there voted down by an affirmative vote a provision requiring the English language to be taught in the public schools. I have borne that in mind ever since, having it in mind never to support the admission of any Territory that refused to require the English language to be taught.

Mr. NELSON. The enabling act provides for that, and the constitution which was adopted approved the enabling act.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have just been looking through the constitution, and I fail to find any provision that could be so construed.

Mr. NELSON. I will find it and insert it in the RECORD.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is a provision with reference to the employment of teachers, but I do not think that goes to the question.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I will look up that paragraph of the constitution later.

Mr. HEYBURN. I asked the question for information.

Mr. NELSON. To sum up briefly, Mr. President, my substitute approves the constitution of New Mexico as it is. With that approval enacted into law, the people there must hold an election, notice of which must be given within 30 days by the governor, and the election must take place not earlier than 60 and not longer than 90 days after the notice of the governor. On the return of the vote for the election of State officers, county officers, legislative officers, judicial officers, and Members of Congress to the President of the United States, it is made his duty by proclamation to declare the admission of the Territory into the Union on an equal footing with the other States of the Union. The same provisions apply to Arizona ex industria. I have put into the amendment a provision that the President must give notice immediately after the passage of this joint resolution to the governor of Arizona. The governor must then within 30 days issue his notice of the election, and that election must be held not earlier than 60 and not later than 90 days after such notice. At that election all the officers that I have mentioned in respect to New Mexico—that is, county officers, State officers, judicial officers, members of the legislature, and Members of Congress—must be voted for, and then the people of Arizona must vote on eliminating that part of article 8 of the proposed constitution relating to the recall of judges. Nothing else is proposed to be eliminated. We do not interfere with the provision for the recall of any other officer. The vote is simply limited to the recall of judges. I believe the people of Arizona will eliminate that provision if it is submitted to them; and, if they do, the Territory of Arizona will come into the Union on an equal footing with New Mexico and at the same time, and no one can claim any political advantage in either direction.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, the Senate has been in session for several hours, and the discussion has been so intensely interesting and has been followed so closely that I appreciate the fact that it is late in the afternoon to begin a discussion with the hope of holding the attention of the Senate much longer; but my convictions, Mr. President, are so strong against what is called the recall of judges, as proposed in the constitution of Arizona and as a general proposition, that I could not forgive myself were I to remain silent and before the matter reaches a vote fail to utter a few words of protest.

Mr. President, I have the honor in part to represent a State which has gone almost as far as any other State in the Union in the direction of the adoption of constitutional provisions intended to emphasize what has been called popular government. That State was the first State in this Union by popular vote to incorporate as a part of its constitution the provision known as the initiative and the referendum. It did so before Oregon adopted such a system. South Dakota enacted that provision in 1898 by a large and decisive majority, and recently it enacted a law by which it has made provision for what is known as the commission form of government in its cities of the first class, and the law providing for the government of these cities by commission contains a provision for the recall of municipal officers.

I will state frankly, Mr. President, that I am in sympathy, so far as States like the one I represent are concerned at least, with the provisions that have been put into constitutions for the purpose of enabling the people in emergencies to compel action upon matters concerning which legislatures have apparently been reluctant about carrying out the popular will. I believe that in a State like South Dakota the initiative is a good thing. I believe that in a State situated as South Dakota is the referendum is a good thing. I am not here to say that, because in experience it has proven itself a good thing in South Dakota, it ought to be thrust upon the people of a great State like New York, with 7,000,000 people. I do not know; I am not here to assume and to state in any dogmatic manner that it would be a success there; but, so far as the Commonwealth which I in part represent is concerned, with less than a million population, a population uniformly intelligent and not in such large numbers as to make it impracticable, it is a good thing; and to-day, after the trial of these years, if a proposition were submitted to the people of that State to take the initiative and referendum out of our constitution, the proposition would be overwhelmingly defeated. So I speak, Mr. President, as one who, so far as his experience and his connection with the people of a single Commonwealth are concerned, is in sympathy with very much that has been said and is being said all over the country in behalf of popular government. I believe that there is virtue in a provision which enables the people of a city which has a corrupt council or a corrupt city official to invoke the recall.

But, Mr. President, I am here to state that I do not find it in conformity with my own judgment and conscience to go further in direct legislation. I am not in sympathy, to be frank about it, with the proposition for a recall when it is applied to State officers elected for the period of two years only. I think in a case of that kind it is a handicap and can not possibly be a benefit. Why? Because a State officer, a governor, elected for only two years, can scarcely begin to carry out a single feature of his administration until, if a petition for his recall should be filed, the process of administration and execution of his policies will be interrupted, and two years will slip by, and the purposes for which he was elected and the work he sought to perform will be defeated by this interference by a recall where the period of office is for only two years. In the case of a governor of a State, elected for two years, sworn in, with a new legislature on his hands, with a new corps of State officers, with a legislative program that he expects to carry out, a small portion of the electors of the State by circulating a petition for a recall would involve him in a special election within a few months after he was installed in his office.

I say that in effect that proposition, as applied to these short terms, will be not only an instrument of obstruction and demoralization, but it has in it no protection for the public. I believe that the recall in that case, which is sufficient, is the recall which occurs in the recurring election every two years, when the officer must go before the people of his State and submit for their approval the record he has made for the two years, and if he can not satisfy them as to his efficiency and his honesty there is all the opportunity necessary for his recall. But when you go beyond that point and propose to place in the hands of a small number the power to file a petition and recall judges a step has been taken which means revolution.

From the arguments that have been made on this floor one would imagine that a judge or a State officer is a mere representative of the majority and no one else. I admit that if I go out in my State as a candidate on a platform framed by a convention of my party, embracing certain propositions, and my opponent goes out before the people of that State upon a platform presenting certain propositions advocated by his party, and we make a square issue upon those subjects, and we go out and discuss before the people of that State the issues involved, and wage a contest as to whether or not they shall give their approval to the propositions that he and his party are presenting or the opposing propositions that I and the party with which I am connected are presenting, and I win, the majority of the electors of the State deciding in favor of the propositions advocated by my party, then I, as well as the party I represent, am under obligation to enact the laws specifically pledged and specifically declared for in the campaign; to that extent, and that extent only, do I represent the majority.

But, sir, when it comes to the general administration of my office, such as the assessment of the property of the railways in my State, the telegraph companies in my State, the express companies in my State, the insurance companies in my State, the property of individual owners scattered over my State—when I act upon an assessing board to determine what the valuation of property shall be, so that there shall be a fair distribution of the burdens of government in my State, and upon general subjects of administration based upon justice and equity, which may not have been involved in the campaign at all—may not have been in issue by any party in the campaign, and which all parties sustain—do I represent the majority? No. I represent every single property owner in my State, whether that property owner is a Socialist or a Democrat or a Republican or an anarchist. My obligation to him is just as sacred and just as binding upon me as a public officer, even though he be a member of the smallest and most insignificant political organization in the State, as it is to the party to which I belong.

Does anyone contend that my acts as a public officer are acts for which I am responsible to the majority only, and that if those acts do not meet with the approval of the temporary majority that majority shall have the right to dictate what I shall do? And if I fail to obey they shall have as a weapon by which to intimidate me the fear that unless I do obey the wish of that fleeting majority of to-day, which may be the minority to-morrow, I shall be involved at once in a fight for my political existence, or in a fight to retain the official position which I hold? Does anyone contend for a moment that the people of this country support, or wish to support, or have asked that we support in their behalf any such proposition as that, sir? I answer that they have not. They are quite content to wait until the expiration in regular course of these short biennial terms for State officers and to pass upon their claims for longer service at the frequently recurring elections held for that purpose. Except that, of course, in every State provision is made for removing all corrupt State officers by impeachment.

We run wild over some of these things, but I am not going to use ridicule in connection with them. A judge is not selected as a representative of the majority. The majority determines who shall be the judge in States where judges are elected. That, however, is simply the settlement of the method of selecting the judges. When they are selected by that method, the instrumentality and influence of the majority, so far as they are concerned, are at an end. The majority has simply performed its function in selecting the judge, and the moment he is installed he represents all the people, including the most humble, the weakest individual in the community. His obligation to the most unfortunate member of society, the man or the woman without friends, without property and helpless, is just as sacred, if not more sacred, than his obligation to the majority. His obligation to such is just as sacred, if not more sacred, than it is to the political party of which he is a member and whose suffrages put him in that position. The American people are told upon the floor of the Senate that the member of a court is a mere representative of the majority. What is that majority? It may to-day be made up of one class, the radical element; at the next election it may be made up of what we call the conservative element.

The pendulum swings back and forth. Are the laws to be changed every time the pendulum swings hither or yon? Shall the majority have the right to say: "Because we were the minority when one set of judges was put in power and rendered one class of decisions, now that we are in the majority we will put some new judges on the bench, and we will tear down the precedents heretofore written; we will overthrow the rulings heretofore made. The question of vested rights, the question of individual rights, the question of religious liberty, the question of the rights of a race, the question regarding any other right whatsoever shall be decided now according to our will—the will of to-day, which is different from the will of yesterday."

Oh, the American people have never asked for such a thing as that; and, Senators, those of us who stand for what are called progressive policies, who have made fights in our States for the regulation of corporations and the correction of abuses and the privilege of the humblest voter to have a voice in the selection of candidates for office, so that the candidates of his party shall be selected by the majority of his party rather than in the private offices of some great corporation—we have made a fight for victories won here and there; we have promoted and strengthened a great movement for better government, but I tell you we will destroy it all and sweep it all away if we show that we have not sufficient good sense and control over ourselves to know when and where to stop.

Are we going to stand for the removal of judges because their temperament is not the radical temperament that you and I and John Smith and John Brown possess? Are we going to remove judges—conceding them to be honest and brave and courageous—because we say "their leanings were a little too much on the side of property, according to our view, and not quite strong enough on the side of humanity; and, therefore, while we will not hurt their feelings by putting in the petition for their recall that we object to them on that ground, we will nevertheless petition for their recall? We will treat them kindly, and after we have put them out of office we will pension them; but we will gently put them aside, because temperamentally they are not in harmony with us." We have heard talk of that kind here. Does anybody believe that it will meet the approval of the American people?

Do you think the American people, with all their traditions, with their history, with their love for their courts and the institutions of their land, are going for one moment to follow a leadership that preaches a doctrine like that?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator from South Dakota desire to conclude this evening?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not care to proceed further this evening unless it is desired.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes.

RECESS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senate has been in session since 10 o'clock this morning. It is very apparent we are not going to reach a vote to-day. After conferring with numerous Senators I think it desirable that we take a recess until to-morrow morning. I therefore move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, August 8, 1911, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, August 7, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., as follows:

Our Father in heaven, we bless Thee for the onward march of civilization witnessed on every hand. Through the discoveries and ingenuity of man the elements have been harnessed and made to do the bidding of intelligence. The world is growing smaller; intellectual, moral, and spiritual liberty is growing larger. The peoples of all the earth are becoming better acquainted with each other, and the things which make for righteousness are in the ascendency. God grant that the time may speedily come when all men shall look up to Thee and worship Thee as Father and live together as brothers, each vying with each to make this dear old world a better and happier dwelling place for all Thy children. And glory and honor and praise be Thine forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, August 5, 1911, was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. LINDSAY, for the remainder of the session, on account of sickness.

Mr. BOEHNE, indefinitely, at the request of Mr. ADAIR, on account of sickness.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 2983. An act for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Thirteenth Census.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. This being suspension day, the Chair will direct the Clerk to call the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

BARON VON STEUBEN.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was House concurrent resolution 3, which the Clerk reported by title.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, can we not have the resolution reported?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 3.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there shall be printed and bound in the form of eulogies, with accompanying illustrations, 17,100 copies of the proceedings upon the unveiling of the statue of Baron von Steuben in Washington, December 7, 1910, of which 5,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, 2,000 to be delivered to the National German-American Alliance for such distribution as said alliance may desire to make, and the remaining 100 copies shall be bound in full morocco and distributed through the Department of State to the descendants of Baron von Steuben and the speakers who took part in said celebration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution reported by the Clerk? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER] be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has one hour, and if he wants to yield 10 minutes of it he may.

Mr. MANN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER], although I do not understand that I have one hour.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, I deem it proper to make on this floor a brief preliminary statement regarding the old-age pension bill which I introduced last Monday.

Within a year you will all have to make up your minds on this subject. You will have to determine where you stand. A mighty wave of demands for the passage of some such law will roll in from every section of the country, and the issue will have to be met.

AMERICA BACKWARD IN SOCIAL LEGISLATION.

The working men and working women of this country are entitled to be taken care of in their old age. Most of them receive, in return for their labor, so small a part of what they produce that all of it is expended in merely keeping alive. Since the average wage in our country is probably not more than $400 a year, it is obvious that it is impossible for at least half of the population to save up anything for old age.

The working class is not better off in the matter of wages in any other country. But in many of the other countries the duty of society to the aged is recognized. Old-age pension laws have been passed in the principal nations of Europe, in the Antipodes, and even in one American nation. Germany, Denmark, Italy, Austria, Great Britain, France, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand have all enacted such laws.

As usual, where legislation for the protection of the working class is concerned, the United States is lagging behind. The Republican Party put such a plank in its platform of 1900, but the Republican Congress did nothing in the matter, and the plank has disappeared from subsequent platforms.

CONDITION OF AGED WORKERS GROWING WORSE.

There can be no doubt that the condition of the aged workers has grown worse in this country during the last 30 years.

And for this reason:

Our country is rapidly changing from an agricultural to a manufacturing country.

On the farm it is comparatively easy to take care of the aged. Especially was it so in former days when living was cheap.

There is plenty of room on the farm. And even old people can usually do some chores—enough to make up for the slight expense of their keep.

It is thus no special hardship for their friends and relatives to take care of them.

The case is entirely different with the urban workers. The maintenance of their old folks by the wageworkers of the cities—especially where these men and women have children to take care of—is nowadays simply impossible.

Aged working men and working women therefore soon become objects of private or public charity.

After having lived a life of usefulness, the working men and working women of the country—the men and women who create all wealth—are usually subject to all the indignities, the sordidness, and misery of the poorhouse or the system of "outdoor relief."

No wonder there are so many tragedies. Men and women of finer sensibilities prefer death to this humiliation. [Applause.]

THE TRAGEDY OF DESTITUTE AGE.

The aim of every normal man and woman is an old age free from care and want. To that end most of them toil patiently and live closely, seeking to save something against the day when they can earn no more. And yet the same fate awaits the overwhelming mass of them. In the life of the toiler there are weeks, and sometimes months, of enforced idleness, weeks of unavoidable illness, losses from cheating and swindling, and then, as age creeps on, from about his forty-fifth year, a constantly declining capacity to earn, until at 55 or 60 he finds himself helpless and destitute. There is hardly a more pitiful tragedy than the lot of the toiler who has struggled all his life to gain a competence and who at 60 years faces the poorhouse.

The black slave had no such tragedy as this. It is a tragedy reserved for the free worker in "the freest nation on the globe."

There can be no question as to the right of these men and women to be taken care of decently in their old age. They have made civilization possible for everybody, and especially for the comfortable classes.

As I said before, from their earnings—the average is about $400—it is absolutely impossible for them to save anything for their old age. Even if they should descend to a Chinese standard of living, they could not, as a mass, lay by a competence. They would thereby diminish trade, cause hard times, and change our civilization. But they could not, under our present system, secure themselves against want in their old age.

MILITARY VETERANS AND INDUSTRIAL VETERANS.

Everybody in America readily understands why soldiers are entitled to pensions. It is because soldiers render service on the field of battle which is considered dangerous to life and limb. But very few people realize that the number of wage earners killed and maimed every year on the railroads, in the mines, factories, and other industries in our country is approximately equal to the number of soldiers killed and wounded in any one year of our great Civil War, with all its terrible battles.

Moreover, there are any number of occupational diseases which are the natural result of certain kinds of necessary work, but which make total or partial invalids of hundreds of thousands of wage earners.

The work of the soldier of industry is infinitely more necessary than the bloody work of the soldier on the battle field. Most of the labor performed must be performed every day and every hour, or our civilization would stop. [Applause.]

The aged working men and working women have therefore a claim on society that is even better than the claim of the soldier.

THE PENSION A RECOMPENSE FOR UNPAID WORK.

Any toiler who has faithfully labored for a meager wage for 20 years or more has created more wealth than a pension in old age can repay. Every toiler produces more than he is paid. Otherwise he would not be employed. It is a condition of the capitalist order of society that the employer must get the lion's share of the product.

The word "pension" in this case is a misnomer. The payment ought to be called either "partial restitution" or "old folks's compensation."

The old-age pension bill which I have introduced is therefore a measure of simple justice. It is also an expression of the rapidly growing demand that America shall not lag behind the rest of the civilized world in taking care of the veterans of industry.

My bill does not go into administrative details, and does not try to provide for the many complex situations that may arise in the operation of such a law.

The details will have to be settled by a commission to be appointed for that purpose. I have introduced at the same time a bill for the creation of such a commission.

NUMBER OF PENSIONERS.

Four dollars a week is to be the basic figure of the pension for every man and woman more than 60 years old, with gradations downward for persons in comparatively decent circumstances.

The ratio of persons more than 60 years old in the 1900 census, when applied to the 1910 census, would give about 5,800,000 persons.

It is assumed that 1,000,000 of these are foreign born, or have not been citizens 16 years.

It is further assumed that 1,500,000 of these, either by the ownership or use of property, or the receipt of incomes above the limit designated, or because they are already in receipt of civil, military, or naval pensions, or because they are in some way disqualified, will not come under the terms of the act.

Approximately 2,500,000 of the remainder are married and living together, and as each married couple counts only as one person and a half, there would be a further reduction of 625,000 persons. This would leave a remainder of 2,675,000 persons to be pensioned.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire only two or three minutes additional.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

COST OF THE PENSION SCHEME.

Mr. BERGER. As the average pension would range somewhere about $2.50 a week, the cost of the pension scheme would be about $347,000,000 yearly.

This sum may be staggering to some good folk who believe in cheap government and in everybody taking care of himself. But if our Nation can pay yearly $131,000,000 for a Navy, $95,000,000 for an Army, and $155,000,000 for pensioning war veterans, a total of $381,000,000, it should certainly be able to pay an equal sum to pension its veterans of industry.

As a matter of fact we pay a great deal more than this sum for this purpose now. The total expenditures made in a thousand complex ways by Nation, State, county, municipality, and private agency in relieving the destitution of the aged would, if properly computed, show a much greater amount than what this bill asks. Only we do the thing at present in an inefficient, expensive, and cruel way. It is time now that we meet the problem in a scientific and economical way.

Remember that these destitute aged men and women have, from their childhood, aided in creating the wealth which makes possible the payment of such large appropriations for the Navy, the Army, and the war pensions.

OBJECTIONS TO PRIVATE PENSION SCHEMES.

Many great private corporations are now establishing old-age pensions for their employees. This tendency has been applauded by the very men who oppose Government pensions for the aged. But there are two great objections to old-age pensions by private corporations. In order to gain a pension from a corporation it is necessary for the workingman to tie himself to the corporation for life. In order not to lose the pension the working man or working woman must be satisfied with his or her wage, laboring conditions, and hours of labor. This subservience makes the laborer virtually a serf or slave and establishes a new feudalism.

The second objection to private old-age pensions is that the system smacks of charity. It causes the worker to feel that some one owns him. The private system results in the bestowal of too much power in the hands of the employer over his workers.

THE MATTER OF CONSTITUTIONALITY.

Of course there are also some other good folk who may worry about the constitutionality of the bill. I believe that this old-age pension bill is perfectly constitutional, but some of the antisocial Supreme Court justices may hold a different opinion. The bill furnishes a good opportunity for testing the power of the Federal courts to annul necessary legislation enacted by Congress. I have therefore put at the end of the bill a clause based on a precedent furnished by Congress in reconstruction times, and held constitutional at the time, forbidding the Federal courts to question the validity of this measure.

The old men and women are entitled to a living outside of the poorhouse and without the aid of private charity. If the old parties and the Supreme Court do not realize this fact, they will be wiped out of existence, together with the old Constitution.

New times require new laws. [Applause.]

CONGRESS V. SUPREME COURT.

Now, here is an addition giving a precedent in 1868, which I ask unanimous consent to insert in my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend the matter indicated in his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BERGER. On March 27, 1868, Congress passed a law prohibiting the Supreme Court from passing on the constitutionality of the reconstruction laws which it had passed after the Civil War. This law was passed over President Johnson's veto.

The cause of this defiant position of Congress was the fact that the Attorney General had expressed an opinion that the reconstruction laws were unconstitutional. He also refused to appear against one McCardle, of Mississippi, who had an appeal for a habeas corpus writ before the Supreme Court. McCardle had been arrested by the military authorities for criticizing their conduct in a newspaper.

The law passed by the Republicans had its desired effect. When the McCardle case afterwards came up before the Supreme Court on April 12, 1868, Chief Justice Chase, in the opinion of the entire court, said:

It is quite true, as was argued by the counsel for the petitioner, that the appellate jurisdiction of this court is not derived from the acts of Congress. It is, strictly speaking, conferred by the Constitution. But it is conferred "with such exceptions and under such regulations as Congress shall make."

Also—

We are not at liberty to inquire into the motives of the legislature. We can only examine into its power under the Constitution, but the power to make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction is given in express words.

What, then, is the effect of the repealing act upon the case before us? We can not doubt as to this: Without jurisdiction the court can not proceed at all in any cause. Jurisdiction is power to declare the law, and when it ceases to exist, the only function remaining to the court is that of announcing the fact and dismissing the cause. And this is not less clear upon authority than upon principle.

Also—

It is quite clear, therefore, that this court can not proceed to pronounce judgment in this case, for it has no longer jurisdiction of the appeal; and judicial duty is not less fitly performed by declining ungranted jurisdiction than in exercising firmly that which the Constitution and the laws confer.

The foregoing decision clearly shows that the Supreme Court can not have jurisdiction unless it is granted by Congress.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, what is the matter of business before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is the von Steuben resolution providing for printing.

Mr. CANNON. Is it a resolution to print eulogies?

The SPEAKER. On Gen. von Steuben.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I notice from the calendar that the resolution is on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. That is true. If the gentleman from Illinois raises the point I will put the proper question to the House.

Mr. CANNON. No; I do not raise the point, but only by unanimous consent, I take it, can it be considered in the House; otherwise it will have to be considered in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent was given for its present consideration, but to cure any technicality in the matter——

Mr. CANNON. Well, I am not raising a technicality; it is not a technical question. When unanimous consent is given it seems to me that a bill must be considered under the rule, and that requires the House to go into the Committee of the Whole to consider it. I have no objection to its consideration by the House; but, so far as I understand, unanimous consent was not given to discharge the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is correct. Whenever a bill or resolution is on the Union Calendar the proper motion is—and for the purpose of this occasion I will assume that the gentleman from Illinois made it—to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of it and to consider it in the House.

Mr. CANNON. That, of course, would require unanimous consent. Unanimous consent has been given, as I understand it, to consider the bill. I have no objection to its consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. In the Committee of the Whole House under the five-minute rule? Is that the order, or is it in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House under the five-minute rule?

The SPEAKER. If it is considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole the five-minute rule applies. If it is considered in the House, it does not. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

CITY OF CRAWFORD, STATE OF NEBRASKA.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12051) for the relief of the city of Crawford, in the State of Nebraska.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Connecticut rise?

Mr. TILSON. When the Clerk has reported the bill, I wish to be recognized.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the city of Crawford, in the State of Nebraska, is hereby granted a right of way across the military reservation of Fort Robinson, Nebr., at such location as may be determined by the said city of Crawford and approved by the Secretary of War, to construct and maintain a pipe line for the purpose of carrying water from a point beyond the said military reservation across said reservation and to the said city of Crawford.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Provided, That the entire cost of construction and maintenance shall be paid by the city of Crawford: And provided further, That the pipe shall be covered and the surface restored to its present condition by and at the expense of said city of Crawford.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Connecticut rise?

Mr. TILSON. I have been directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report this bill to the House and ask for its consideration by unanimous consent. I ask to be recognized.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut will have to make his motion first.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I reserve the right to object before the gentleman gets started.

Mr. TILSON. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from further consideration of this bill and that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from further consideration of the bill which has been reported by the Clerk, and that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to inquire whether the gentleman will accept as an amendment a new section to the effect that "the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is expressly reserved"?

Mr. TILSON. I have no objection to that amendment. I shall ask the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID], in whose territory it is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] have any objection to a section reserving the right to alter, amend, or repeal the act?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I have no objection whatever.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will offer that amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SIMS. The mere fact that a bill is on the Unanimous Consent Calendar I do not understand gives it the position of unanimous consent for consideration until the question has been put by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. That is exactly what the Speaker was going to do.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], as I understood it, put the unanimous-consent request as to consideration in the House instead of in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. It seems to me the regular procedure required two requests for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The usual practice has been to put the whole motion at once.

Mr. TILSON. I renew my request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12051) for the relief of the city of Crawford, in the State of Nebraska.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TILSON. Just a word of explanation, I think, is all that will be necessary in this case. The Committee on Military Affairs has considered this bill and has made a unanimous report. It contains only a few lines, and I shall read it to the House, as I believe it states the case fully:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12051) for the relief of the city of Crawford, in the State of Nebraska, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass.

It appears from the evidence before your committee that Fort Robinson is situated about 3 miles upstream from the city of Crawford and that the military reservation includes land on both sides of and abutting upon the stream. The city of Crawford takes its water supply from this stream below the reservation, and it is represented to your committee that by reason of sewage and other deleterious matter emptied into the stream from the reservation the water is contaminated, causing periodical epidemics of typhoid fever. It appears that there are at present a number of typhoid cases in the city of Crawford believed to be from the same cause.

The city of Crawford has decided to change the location of the intake of its water supply to a point above the military reservation, and in order to do so asks permission to lay its pipes across the reservation. There is no objection on the part of the War Department.

I wish to say that the committee believes that with the amendment added by the committee and the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] the rights of the Government are completely safeguarded.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE ST. FRANCIS RIVER, MO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6098) to authorize the Campbell Lumber Co. to construct a bridge across the St. Francis River from a point in Dunklin County, Mo., to a point in Clay County, Ark.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if he would object to making an amendment or two to the bill, in order to put it in proper form?

Mr. RUSSELL. I will say to the gentleman that if it is not already in the proper form I have no objection to that.

Mr. MANN. It is always customary in these bills to insert the language "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation." If the gentleman will look at his bill, at the bottom of page 1, he will see this language: "Said bridge to be built across the St. Francis River." I suggest that the gentleman move to strike out the language "said bridge to be built across the said St. Francis River." Then the bill will be in the ordinary form and will provide for a bridge across the St. Francis River in accordance with the provisions of the general bridge act.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have no objections. I thought it was already in accordance with the general bridge act. I copied it from a bridge bill heretofore introduced and passed in the House, and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce were of the opinion that it was in proper form.

Mr. MANN. We should always be careful about it.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am entirely satisfied that the gentleman is familiar with the form it ought to be in, and I have no objection to modifying it in accordance with his suggestion.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do.

Mr. COOPER. I was unable to hear the colloquy just going on. I sent for two of these bills, and I found one of them had the amendment that has been suggested in italics—"at a point suitable to the interests of navigation."

Mr. MANN. That is the language I suggested.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask for some information.

I was informed a few days ago that the Democratic caucus had taken action and decided that at this special session there might be enacted certain emergency measures, and that the committees were given permission by the caucus to consider and report measures that would come within that rule. I was also informed that during the last few days of this session there would be an opportunity to consider and pass such bills. Relying upon that information, I and other Members refrained from putting bills upon the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

What I now desire to ask is, Are we to consider at this time general legislation, regardless of whether an emergency exists or not? And, furthermore, is it the intention before this session ends, by some rule or otherwise, to permit the consideration of measures which are clearly emergency measures and yet are not upon this Unanimous Consent Calendar? I presume there is some gentleman on that side of the House that can enlighten the House in this respect.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] is recognized.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] will yield to me for that purpose, I will make an earnest effort to answer the question of my amiable friend, the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON]. It was his committee that reported this bill to this House.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I shall be glad to hear the statement of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I presumed that the gentleman from South Dakota who asked this question would be glad that the gentleman from Missouri yielded me permission to make an explanation.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That is true, if the gentleman has the time.

Mr. ADAMSON. When the Republican President performed the peculiar action of calling a Democratic Congress in extra session, he placed an injunction or limitation upon the action which that Congress was to take. He suggested that one bill alone should be considered, and no other. When the Congress assembled, a majority of that Congress is reputed to have gone into caucus and agreed to the injunction commanded by the President, with the amendment that we add certain salutary measures which the country needed a great deal more than the Canadian reciprocity.

The committees of the House have, naturally, worked under that compound injunction of the President and the Democratic majority in this House, and my amiable friend from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] and a good many others have asked me this question, if that compound injunction applied to these local bills. I answered in every instance that my understanding was that it was directed mainly against general legislation; that it might be that toward the heel of the session, when the House had done its pressing work and was waiting on a more dignified and slow-moving body for cooperation, we might then get up the local bills for the building of bridges, in which so many Members of the House were interested. I suggested to all gentlemen who asked me that they introduce their bills and have them referred to the committee ready to be acted on. In due season there appeared to be a general consent that these local bridge bills, of local interest to Members, most of which are urgent, might be reported and acted upon. I then conferred with the minority leader. I had to inform him that the most of them were Republican bills—I think two-thirds of them. He very kindly said, "There will be no objection to their consideration." Therefore, having had an understanding which I thought was amicable on both sides of the House, and having obtained the opinion of the Speaker, which was to the effect that it would not violate the injunction, compound as it was, the committee proceeded to report every bridge bill referred to us.

I wish to say further, a great many of these bills have not been placed on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. While that is not my fault, yet I would be glad if every bill could be considered. I have asked the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] if there would be any objection to their consideration, anyway, and he thought not. I do not think there will be any objection on either side of the House.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I wish to say to the gentleman from Georgia that I have no recollection, in the few years that I have served in this House, of having ever objected to any request for unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is like myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I have no intention of objecting at this time to any bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. What I am desiring to ascertain is whether there is some understanding by which we may hope to get consideration of some bills before this session ends—bills which come within the understanding which, I believe, was reached by the Democratic caucus—emergency measures. I have been before one or two committees, one of which I am a member of, where the statement was exacted from the person offering a bill that it was an emergency matter which could not, without injury to the parties affected, go over until the regular session, and the statement was made that only such bills would be considered. I think the statement was generally made that at the end of the session there would be two days to afford an opportunity to pass such bills. Now, what I am trying to ascertain is, is that the understanding, and will we have a chance later to pass these bills, or should they have been upon the Unanimous Consent Calendar? I want to say, as one Member, that I have two or three bills that would have been placed upon this Unanimous Consent Calendar had I not relied upon the understanding that I supposed existed as to how we should proceed.

Mr. ADAMSON. Have they been reported?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then I shall ask unanimous consent, at this time or some other time, that all the bridge bills that have been reported may be considered, whether they are on the Unanimous Consent Calendar or not.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that gentlemen who have bills reported out which they desire to have considered by unanimous consent have been derelict in their duty if they have not placed them on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent. The rules provide a method for calling up matters by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] has stated a condition that arose in one of the committees of this House. We understood in that committee definitely that no legislation should be enacted at this session on a general call of the calendar, and that only upon the last two days of the session could such matters be considered. That is the reason why bills reported since that time were not directed to be placed upon the Unanimous Consent Calendar. It was our understanding that such bills would not be considered at this session of Congress.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. How did the gentleman get such an understanding? That is an absolutely new thing to me.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It has been reported over and over again through the press during this session of Congress that the House would consider no legislation except emergency legislation.

Mr. MANN. That is, before a bill is reported; but when the bill is reported and is on the calendar, gentlemen have a right to place it on the Unanimous Consent Calendar and have it considered, if we should meet on any Unanimous Consent Calendar day, as we are now doing.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is true, but it was generally understood that Unanimous Consent Calendar would not be called to-day. I have seen this House adjourn over Monday when it was possible to call up bills on this calendar.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman noticed that I have the first bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have noticed that, but I have also noted that the gentleman has not succeeded in calling it up—either that or other bills that he has on the Discharge Calendar.

Mr. MANN. And I took the right chance and put the bill on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Campbell Lumber Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Missouri, its successors and assigns, be, and it is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto, across the St. Francis River, from a point in Dunklin County, Mo., near range line between ranges 8 and 9, in township 18, to a point in section 6, township 19, range 9, in Clay County, Ark.; said bridge to be built across the St. Francis River in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is expressly reserved.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 1, line 7, by inserting after the word "river" the following: "At a point suitable to the interests of navigation."

Amend page 1, lines 10 and 11, by striking out after the word "Arkansas" the semicolon and insert a comma; and by striking out the words "said bridge to be completed across the St. Francis River."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman state what the effect of his amendment is?

Mr. MANN. One amendment was to insert, after the word "river," the words "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation."

Mr. COOPER. I understood that.

Mr. MANN. And at the bottom of the page there was a duplication of the provision that the bridge was to be built across the St. Francis River according to the bridge law. If you strike that out, it reads that the bridge shall be constructed, maintained, and operated in accordance with the bridge law, which is the proper way.

Mr. COOPER. Was not the general bridge law approved March 23, 1906——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has in mind the general dam act.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

EXTENDING ACT OF JUNE 10, 1880, TO BROWNSVILLE, TEX.

The next business on the Unanimous Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2925) to extend the privileges of the act approved June 10, 1880, to the port of Brownsville, Tex.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the privileges of the act approved June 10, 1880, governing the transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement be, and the same are hereby, extended to the port of Brownsville, Tex.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I see no reasons nor information given in the report on the bill. Gentlemen ought to be willing, when they report a bill, to give some reason or some information in regard to it if they want it to pass by unanimous consent. Or they should supply it now, and I think the gentleman from Texas is anxious to supply the information.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the House, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Ways and Means and has the approval of the Treasury Department. There has been recently built across the river from Brownsville to Matamoros, Mexico, a railroad bridge connecting the Frisco system in the United States with the International system in Mexico, and it is essential that this bill should pass in order to accommodate the commerce going through that port.

Mr. MANN. What commerce is there there? The gentleman says it has the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. If so, it ought to appear in the report.

Mr. GARNER. My colleague, Mr. RANDELL, who is not here, has the papers in the case. There is a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury stating the fact that he sent his agent to Brownsville, and he made the report on the bill, and that the commerce there not only justifies but demands the passage of this legislation, and he recommended an amendment to the original bill that I introduced. The bill which I introduced extended the provisions of the entire law of 1880 to Brownsville. The bill was amended, in pursuance of the suggestion from the Treasury Department, and now only extends, as the gentleman will observe, to the first section of the act approved June 10, 1880.

Mr. MANN. This would result in an appraisement of imported merchandise being made at Brownsville, Tex.

Mr. GARNER. That is my understanding; yes.

Mr. MANN. And for men being employed there to make that appraisement.

Mr. GARNER. The Secretary of the Treasury said that there would be comparatively no extra expense, the officers at Brownsville now there would be sufficient. I may say that there are four ports in the State of Texas.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear what is going on over there.

Mr. MANN. Then come over this way.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Illinois, Dr. FOSTER, will come over here into civilization, and not stay on the outskirts, he may hear what is going on. [Laughter.] I was about to remark to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that there are four ports of entry in Texas—El Paso, Eagle Pass, Laredo, and Brownsville—and each of these ports enjoy the privileges of the act of 1880 except Brownsville. The law has not been extended to Brownsville heretofore, because whatever goods were imported were brought across in skiffs, there being no railroad connection, but since the railroad reached the city and a bridge has been constructed, under the authority of the gentleman from Illinois, three sessions ago, the necessity for extending the privileges of 1880 has arisen.

Mr. KENDALL. What is the commerce there?

Mr. GARNER. It will be equal to any in the ports of Texas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FITZGERALD). Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Texas how close the nearest port of entry is to Brownsville, Tex.?

Mr. GARNER. It is about 175 miles.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I have been unable to hear the gentleman very well because I was not lucky enough to secure as good a seat as he did, but is the necessity for the admission of goods into this place that is proposed to be made a subport of entry such as to justify the establishment of a port at that place?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, in reply to that question I will say this: The bridge recently constructed across the Rio Grande has connected two of the largest railways in the Republic of Mexico and the Republic of the United States. Just what the commerce will be I could not tell the gentleman, but the reports from the Treasury Department and from the railroad officials of the Frisco system are to the effect that it will be as great, if not greater, than any other port bordering on the Republic of Mexico.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I would ask the gentleman if his colleague's resolution which was offered, providing for reciprocity between Mexico and the United States, goes through, what will be the use of establishing a customs port at this place? Is not the gentleman aware of the fact that such a measure is proposed by his colleague from Texas?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I prefer to get results with reference to this legislation rather than to enter into a discussion of free trade between Mexico and the United States; but I may say to my friend from Colorado that I do not anticipate the immediate passage of the resolution of my colleague from Texas. This is an emergency measure and I would like to have it go through.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, of course I shall make no objection as long as I know my friend from Texas will oppose such a plan as reciprocity between Mexico and the United States when it is brought forward.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have not heard just what it is that makes the passage of this bill an emergency at this time by unanimous consent.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] suggests that the fact that I want to pass the bill makes it an emergency, which appeals to my mind very strongly, but I will say to my friend from Kansas that the completion of this bridge connecting these two great systems of railway makes it very inconvenient for the appraisement of goods. There is a large commerce in that city.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What is the commerce of that city at this time?

Mr. GARNER. I could not give the gentleman the tonnage or the value. All I know is that the Treasury Department sent its agent there——

Mr. CAMPBELL. But what is the nature of the commerce that comes in and goes out through that port which makes it an emergency to have this measure passed now?

Mr. GARNER. I am not able to give the gentleman that information, other than the general commerce that goes on between the Republic of Mexico and the Republic of the United States. The same necessity exists for this to be made an immediate port of entry that exists for El Paso, Eagle Pass, or Laredo.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, the committee does not say so in its report. I have a bill pending to make Cherryvale, Kans., a subport of entry, and it is quite as necessary as the place in Texas, and the necessity arises from much the same condition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution and bill of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 49. Joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to make a per capita payment to the enrolled members of the Five Civilized Tribes entitled to share in the funds of said tribes; and

S. 3151. An act to extend time of payment of balance due for lands sold under act of Congress approved June 17, 1910.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 1) to correct errors in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911.

SENATE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill and joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 3151. An act to extend time of payment of balance due for lands sold under act of Congress approved June 17, 1910; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. J. Res. 49. Joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to make a per capita payment to the enrolled members of the Five Civilized Tribes entitled to share in the funds of said tribes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER, WELDON SPRINGS LANDING, MO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11660) to authorize the St. Louis-Kansas City Electric Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri at or near the town of Weldon Springs Landing, Mo.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11660) to authorize the St. Louis-Kansas City Electric Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the town of Weldon Springs Landing, Mo.

Be it enacted, etc., That the St. Louis-Kansas City Electric Railway Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Missouri, is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches across the Missouri River at or near the town of Weldon Springs Landing, in the State of Missouri, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 1, line 7, after "river," insert "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman who reported this bill or who is in charge of it if he has not overlooked the necessary provision which will allow the Secretary of War to supervise and regulate the traffic across that bridge?

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman from Missouri intend to try to pass the Senate bill instead of the House bill?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; that is the gentleman's intention.

Mr. MANN. Then I hope the gentleman will move to lay this bill on the table, otherwise it will waste the time of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to substitute a similar Senate bill for the House bill.

Mr. MANN. The Senate bill is on the Unanimous Consent Calendar and comes next.

Mr. BORLAND. I understand that before the motion for a substitute can be made the original bill must be reported to the House.

Mr. MANN. It is not necessary to substitute it; the Senate bill is on the calendar.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move that this House bill be laid on the table and that we proceed to the consideration of the next bill, which is the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the House bill will be laid on the table, and the Clerk will report the Senate bill.

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. And then I will yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2768) to authorize the St. Louis-Kansas City Electric Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the town of Weldon Springs Landing, Mo.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to renew the question which I put to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. I will ask the gentleman to state his question.

Mr. ANTHONY. I desire to ask the gentleman whether or not he had not overlooked the necessary provision in this bill which will reserve to the Secretary of War the right to provide suitable regulations for the traffic which goes over that bridge?

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman refer to the act known as the Mann Act, regulating the construction of bridges?

Mr. ANTHONY. There is such a provision in a number of bridge bills which have been previously passed in reference to bridges.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to suggest to the gentleman that that is contained in the general bridge bill.

Mr. BORLAND. In answer to the gentleman from Kansas I desire to say that that is included in the general bridge act.

Mr. ANTHONY. Not to my knowledge; and unless the gentleman knows there is a provision under the general bridge act which confers these powers on the Secretary of War, I should prefer to offer a new section to his bill.

Mr. BORLAND. This bill reserves to the Secretary of War all the powers embraced in the general bridge act and that includes, I think, all to which the gentleman from Kansas refers.

Mr. ANTHONY. I want to state for the information of the gentleman from Missouri and the House that controversies are raging in several towns along the Missouri River now where complaint is made in regard to where tolls are charged for wagons and other traffic across these various bridges. In some bridge bills express power was given to the Secretary of War to pass on the reasonableness of the tolls charged for wagon traffic, and I desire to have in this bill a provision which confers that same power on the Secretary of War that he has over other bridges in the neighborhood.

Mr. MANN. He has it under the general bridge act. There has been no such provision inserted in any bill since the passage of that act.

Mr. ANTHONY. What were the terms of the general bridge act?

Mr. MANN. I can not quote them to the gentleman.

Mr. ANTHONY. In the absence of specific knowledge I would like to offer a new section to that bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is entitled to the floor. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY]?

Mr. BORLAND. After a brief statement I will yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY]. I want to say to the gentleman from Kansas that this particular bill is simply a change of location from that provided in a bill that was passed at the last session. At the last session Congress adopted two bills, one permitting this company to bridge the Missouri River at Arrow Rock, and the other at St. Charles.

In carrying out the surveying plans it was found the bridge at St. Charles would have to be moved to Weldon Landing, and the purpose of the present bill is to enable the company to bridge at Weldon Landing. The form of the bill follows precisely the form of the original bill. It is the same form that has been reported on these other bills by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and it refers to the general bridge act, known as the Mann Act, which, as I understand, includes all the powers that are vested in the Secretary of War to control these bridges across navigable streams. That is the statement of the present chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the former chairman. That being true, I would ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] to withhold his amendment, unless he has the law to cite to us that requires such an amendment. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. ANTHONY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] a question. Does the Mann Bridge Act expressly provide that the Secretary of War shall have the power to regulate the prices for wagon tolls across these bridges?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I think if the gentleman will refer to the act he will find all those provisions in it, providing for the regulation of tolls, navigation, and all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of a Senate bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, would not the consideration of an amendment come up first? I offered an amendment. Would not its consideration come up first?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas has not had the floor thus far.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask recognition now.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]?

Mr. BORLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Section 4 of the general bridge act contains this provision:

If tolls shall be charged for the transit over any bridge constructed under the provisions of this act, of engines, cars, street cars, wagons, carriages, vehicles, animals, foot passengers, or other passengers, such tolls shall be reasonable and just, and the Secretary of War may, at any time, and from time to time, prescribe the reasonable rates of toll for such transit over such bridge, and the rates so prescribed shall be the legal rates and shall be the rates demanded and received for such transit.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I am much obliged for that information. There was some doubt in my mind concerning it. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. Inasmuch as the gentleman does not offer an amendment, I ask for the third reading of the bill.

The bill was read a third time, and having been read a third time, was passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS ST. CROIX RIVER BETWEEN WISCONSIN AND MINNESOTA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6747) to authorize the Wisconsin Central Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the St. Croix River between Wisconsin and Minnesota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Wisconsin Central Railway Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Wisconsin, is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto, across the St. Croix River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near a point on the east bank of said river in the vicinity of the township line between townships 30 and 31 north, in St. Croix County, Wis., to a point on the west bank of said river in the vicinity of the township line between said townships 30 and 31 north, in Washington County, Minn., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 1 after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the act entitled 'An act permitting the Wisconsin Central Railway Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge across the St. Croix River between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota,' approved March 12, 1910, is hereby reenacted; and the time for commencing and completing the bridge therein authorized is hereby extended one year and three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill in reference to the amendment, which I see is an amendment suggested by the War Department. The amendment provides for the reenactment of a law that was passed some time ago—that is, it provides that act is "hereby reenacted." I think that is not very good language. The statute provides the form of enacting bills, and I would like to ask if it would be satisfactory to insert the word "revived" in place of the word "reenacted"?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That will be entirely satisfactory, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. SHERLEY. Before the act is passed by unanimous consent I would like to know what is involved in this reenactment.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, the act was passed a year or two ago, and the Wisconsin Central Railroad Co., through some inadvertence, did not commence the construction of the bridge until after the year in which the act provided the construction should be commenced had passed. The company then discovered, when it filed its plans, that the year had expired, and sent this bill to me, which I introduced. The bridge is now under construction, and it is desired that the original act should be continued, so that the plans and specifications for the bridge filed in the War Department can be considered by the Secretary of War.

Mr. SHERLEY. The only change is the extension of time in which the bridge shall be completed?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Not completed, but commenced. That is all that is necessary yet.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is the only change?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That is the only change desired.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 11, strike out the word "reenacted" at the end of the line and insert the word "revived."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill to reenact an act authorizing the construction of a bridge across St. Croix River, and to extend the time for commencing and completing the said structure."

BRIDGE ACROSS THE ST. CROIX RIVER BETWEEN WISCONSIN AND MINNESOTA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11321) to authorize the Twin City & Lake Superior Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the St. Croix River between Wisconsin and Minnesota.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Twin City & Lake Superior Railway Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Maine, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge, and approaches thereto, across the St. Croix River, at or near a point on the south bank of said river in the vicinity of the center line of section 33, township 36 north, range 20 west, in Chisago County, Minn., to a point on the north bank of said river in the vicinity of the center line of said section 33, township 36 north, range 20 west, in Polk County, in the State of Wisconsin, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, is not Senate bill 1149 for the same identical purpose?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. NYE. No; that is the "Soo."

Mr. MANN. It is not for the same purpose, then?

Mr. NYE. No.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment to the bill and an amendment to the title.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, on page 1, in line 7, after the word "river," the following: "At a point suitable to the interests of navigation."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MANN, the title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the Twin City and Lake Superior Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the St. Croix River between Chicago County, Minn., and Polk County, Wis."

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER IN AITKIN COUNTY, MINN.

The next business on the Unanimous Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7693) authorizing the town of Logan, Aitkin County, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in Aitkin County, Minn.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the town of Logan, a municipal corporation organized under the laws of the State of Minnesota, is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge, and approaches thereto, across the Mississippi River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near the section line between sections 23 and 24 and about one-half mile above Palisade, in the county of Aitkin, in the State of Minnesota, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE ST. CROIX RIVER BETWEEN WISCONSIN AND MINNESOTA.

The next business on the Unanimous Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5138) authorizing the Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie Railway Co. to construct and operate a bridge across the St. Croix River between Wisconsin and Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, the Senate bill 1149, which is now on the calendar, is the same as the House bill 5138, which has just been taken up. If the House sees fit to pass the Senate bill 1149, I will ask to have the other bill laid on the table, and therefore I will ask to have the Senate bill taken up first.

Mr. ADAMSON. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we take up the House bill and lay the other bill on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill to which the gentleman from Minnesota refers has not yet been reported.

Mr. MILLER. I move that we take up the Senate bill and lay the House bill on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill H. R. 5138 will be laid on the table, and the Clerk will report the next bill on the calendar, which is Senate bill 1149.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie Railway Co., a railway corporation organized under the laws of the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota, to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge and approaches thereto, across the St. Croix River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, from a point on the south bank of said river in lot 1, section 21, township 41 north, range 16 west, in Burnett County, Wis., to a point on the north bank of said river in lot 1, section 21, township 41 north, range 16 west, in Pine County, Minn., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE PALMERS OR WARREN RIVER, R. I.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11852) to authorize the Providence, Warren & Bristol Railroad Co. and its lessee, the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., or either of them, to construct a bridge across the Palmers or Warren River, in the State of Rhode Island.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not see the author of this bill in the Hall at this moment.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Speaker, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I am here looking after my bill, and have been here all the morning.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, immediately following this House bill there is a Senate bill which is identical, and I ask unanimous consent that the House bill lie on the table, and that the House proceed to the consideration of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill H. R. 11852, which is identical with the following Senate bill, will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2732) to authorize the Providence, Warren & Bristol Railroad Co. and its lessee, the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., or either of them, to construct a bridge across the Palmers or Warren River, in the State of Rhode Island.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

LOANING MONEY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8768) to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, and real-estate brokers in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I want to submit a request for unanimous consent. Following this bill are two bridge bills, and I ask unanimous consent that they be considered first.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 8768 be passed until the following two bills upon the calendar have been considered. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. DYER. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee the object of his request.

Mr. SIMS. It is simply to get through with the bridge bills that have been reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce before we consider the District bill, for which I understand there is to be a District day.

Mr. MANN. I think it would be a very bad precedent, Mr. Speaker, and I object.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, H. R. 8768.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, as that is rather a long bill, I suggest that the request for its consideration be put before the bill is read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMS. I object to the consideration of the bill at this moment, because I desire to get these bridge bills through.

Mr. SHERLEY. Pending that, I want to say that if objection is made to the consideration of one of the most important and necessary pieces of legislation for the District of Columbia, simply for the purpose of securing consideration of bridge bills, there will be objection to the consideration of those bridge bills.

Mr. SIMS. I have no objection to the legislation.

Mr. SHERLEY. Ah, but the gentleman must not undertake to object to the consideration of this bill in order to get up a bridge bill.

Mr. SIMS. I withdraw my objection. I knew it would require only about 5 or 10 minutes to pass the bridge bills and would not prevent the consideration of the bill referred to by the gentleman from Kentucky, but I am perfectly willing to let the bridge bills wait until the other bill is considered.

Mr. MADDEN. I will renew the objection.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I will reserve the objection for the purpose of giving the gentleman an opportunity to address the House.

Mr. SHERLEY. The bill ought to be reported first, before objection is made.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I make the point of order that until the bill is read it is not before the House for objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been the practice on the Unanimous Consent Calendar to read the bill by title and ask if it is objected to, in order to save time.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will object now.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes, to submit some remarks upon this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes on the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I regret that any Member of the House should feel called upon to make objection to the consideration of this bill. There is no more important legislation, and there has been no more important bill before this House at this session than this bill, now upon the Calendar for Unanimous Consent. For a number of years the people of the District of Columbia, all of its best citizenship, backed up by its citizens' associations, backed up by church organizations, all have been importuning Congress to pass a law that will prevent the loan companies of this city gouging and ruining and breaking up the homes of so many of its people who have to borrow money to tide over temporary distress.

Take the statement of the head of the loan business in this city, the president of the Remedial Loan Association, Mr. Leonard, and read what he says in a pamphlet sent, I take it, to all Members of Congress, in which he says that there is $2,000,000, approximately, loaned out to the citizens of this District by these loan companies and at illegal rates; that $100,000 of that is loaned at a monthly rate of 2 per cent, $200,000 at an average monthly rate of 2½ per cent, and approximately $200,000 at a monthly rate of 3 per cent. The remaining one million and a half dollars is loaned at rates ranging from 5 per cent a month upward. There is the situation which confronts you in this matter. There is no law in the District of Columbia to protect the people who pay these exorbitant rates of interest. In Chicago, New York, and St. Louis and all other cities in this country there is protection for the people.

Some objection has been made to the passage of a law permitting the loaning of money at as high a rate as 2 per cent a month. Your Committee on the District of Columbia have, however, felt from investigations heretofore made that those who are engaged in the business of loaning small sums of money for short periods to persons who have no real estate and who offer only personal property as security are entitled to a higher rate of interest than is provided by existing law in the District of Columbia. The committee believes that 2 per cent per month is ample, however, for the money invested and the risk assumed. It was called to the attention of your Committee on the District of Columbia that pawnbrokers are allowed to charge 3 per cent a month. We believe that that rate is exorbitant, and that pawnbrokers should not be allowed to charge more than 2 per cent. We therefore expressly refused to except the business of pawnbrokers in this proposed law, and if this bill becomes a law pawnbrokers will not be permitted to charge more than 2 per cent a month. Two per cent a month is substantially as high a rate of interest as is permitted to be charged in any State or city.

This bill ought to become a law at this session of Congress. It is needed protection to the people of this city and will also be a protection to the honest and respectable citizens of this District who are engaged in the business of loaning money at a higher rate of interest than 6 per cent per annum. The impositions practiced by money lenders in this city has earned for them the apropos name of "money sharks," and the name money sharks has become generally applied to all those who engage in this business. This should not be, because, as stated above, there are some very splendid citizens of this city who are engaged in this business and who endeavor to conduct it in a respectable and decent manner. It is stated that there are in Washington approximately 100 of these loan companies or individuals who are engaged in the business of money lending in excess of legal rates and that they have an aggregate capital of approximately $2,000,000. Of this $2,000,000 it is said that considerably less than $100,000 is now loaned at a monthly rate of 2 per cent, $200,000 brings an average rate of 2½ per cent, that approximately $200,000 more is loaned at 3 per cent, and the remaining $1,500,000 is loaned at rates ranging from 5 per cent a month upward.

Mr. Walter C. Ufford, 811 G Street NW.; Rev. John Van Schaick, jr., 1417 Massachusetts Avenue; Dr. George M. Kober, 1603 Nineteenth Street; George S. Wilson, 319 District Building; and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia also recommended to the last Congress the passage of a law similar to that provided for by this bill (H. R. 8768).

This bill, which your committee recommends that it do pass, I beg leave to call your attention to its important features. They are as follows:

First. That it requires the payment of a license tax of $500 to the District of Columbia by anyone who desires to engage in the business of loaning money upon which a rate of interest greater than 6 per cent per annum is charged on any security of any kind, direct or collateral, tangible or intangible, and so forth.

Second. That the applicant for a license must file a written application with the District Commissioners setting forth certain information which it is important the commissioners should possess.

Third. That each application shall be accompanied by a bond to the District of Columbia in the penal sum of $5,000, with two or more sufficient sureties, and conditioned that the obligor will not violate any law relating to such business.

Fourth. That all engaged in such business, either persons, firms, voluntary associations, joint-stock companies, incorporated societies, or corporations, shall keep a register approved by the commissioners, showing all the circumstances connected with loans by said persons, corporations, and so forth, which shall be open for inspection to the commissioners, their officers and agents, and that all engaging in such loaning business shall make an annual statement in the form of a trial balance of their books, giving full information with regard to their liabilities and assets.

Fifth. That such licensee shall not charge or receive a greater rate of interest on any loan than 2 per cent per month, and so forth.

Sixth. That upon complaint made in writing to the commissioners and after not less than three days' notice to the licensee a hearing shall be held by said commissioners to determine whether or not the license of said licensee shall be revoked, and that after the removal thereof no license shall be issued to said licensee for one year from the date of the revocation of the former license.

At the last Congress, Mr. W. H. Baldwin, chairman of the citizens' committee selected to petition Congress for the enactment of a law governing this matter, presented, at the request of the committee, a few instances of the imposition practiced upon citizens by money lenders. He stated in his letter, in transmitting the instances herein mentioned, that he could furnish hundreds of more of a similar nature. Some of the cases he cited were the following:

LOAN CASES IN WASHINGTON, D. C.

(a) A woman whose daughter came down with tuberculosis was told by the doctor she must be sent away for this reason at once. She borrowed $100 from a prominent money lender in this city, and besides paying a fee of $1.50 gave 12 monthly notes for $11.70 each, making $140.40. This is equivalent to paying back the $100 in 12 payments of $8.33 a month apart; the rest is interest.

Interest on $8.33 for one month at 6 per cent is $0.04167; at 1 per cent is $0.006945. Time—78 monthly periods × $0.006945 is $0.5417 at 1 per cent. Interest charged, besides fee, $40.40. $\frac{$40.40}{.5417}$ is 74+ per cent per annum, actual rate charged.

For a woman with a sick daughter! She made 8 payments, and then a lawyer helped her out by making a settlement at 6 per cent under threat of prosecution.

(b) A young man in a Government bureau had to have $35. He got it from a man who had started in the loaning business recently and gave 5 monthly notes of $8.95 each—$44.75. This equals 15 monthly payments on one-fifth of the amount borrowed—$7, and the rest is interest.

Interest one month on $7 at 6 per cent, $0.035; at 1 per cent, $0.005833; 15 × $0.005833=$0.0875, is interest at 1 per cent. $\frac{$9.75}{.0875}$ is 111+ per cent per annum, rate charged, and in this case actually collected.

(c) A man borrowed $140, giving a mortgage and another name as surety and making 12 monthly notes of $17 each, $204. This is equivalent to paying back $140 at $11.6666 per month; remainder of $64 is interest. Equals 78 monthly periods.

Interest on $11.6666 for one month at 6 per cent is $0.05833; at 1 per cent is $0.009722; 78 × $0.009722 is $0.7583, interest at 1 per cent on all. $\frac{$64.00}{.7583}$ is 84+ per cent per annum rate actually paid on a well-secured loan of this size.

(d) From another lender a man got $25, paying $1 fee and giving 10 semimonthly notes of $4.20 each, or $42 for the $24 received. This is equvalent to paying back the amount at the rate of $2.40 each half month and the remainder, of $18, is interest and fee.

Interest on $2.40 for one-half month at 6 per cent is $0.006; at 1 per cent is $0.001; 55 periods at $0.001 is $0.055. $\frac{$18.00}{.055}$ is 327 per cent per annum.

If the $1 fee is left out, calling interest $17, it still equals 309 per cent.

This is the worst I have found yet, but there is no limit. They take all they can get.

Two per cent a month will help these people.

The following interesting and significant table of loans actually made in the city of Washington was also furnished by Mr. Baldwin, already mentioned:

Loans of Washington money lenders.

Amounts of money received.	Number of monthly notes:	Amount of payment each month.	Total.	Interest.	Actual rate per annum.

[1] $5.10 each, three-month periods.
[2] Loan reported by Miss Isabel L. Strong, made about Mar. 17, 1910, the day after the Senate hearing on this bill.
[3] Semimonthly.

The citizens of the District of Columbia have been long importuning the Congress of the United States to enact a law which would impose a license upon those engaged in the loaning of money, and providing proper regulations for the control and conduct of the business of loaning money for short periods of time on personal property to persons of small means and those earning small salaries in the District of Columbia. Most of the States and cities in the United States have laws for the regulation of this business, but in the District of Columbia there is none. For many years there has been an urgent demand upon each Congress to pass such a law. Bills to that end have been introduced in both the Senate and the House; have been recommended by the Committees on the District of Columbia, and such a bill passed the Senate at the last session of Congress and one was reported to the House for passage by its Committee on the District of Columbia in the last Congress. In addition to many personal appeals from the citizens for the passage of a law governing the loaning of money, petitions have been presented by a citizens' committee of the District of Columbia, the members of which included the following:

Gen. George H. Harries, 401 P Street NW.; Mr. William F. Gude, 1214 F Street NW.; Justice David J. Brewer, 1923 Sixteenth Street NW.; Mrs. Richard Wainwright, 1264 New Hampshire Avenue; Mrs. Archibald Hopkins, 1826 Massachusetts Avenue; Miss Helen Woodward, 2015 Wyoming Avenue; John B. Sleman, jr., 1408 New York Avenue; Mr. Emmett L. Adams, 503 B Street NE.; Mr. Evan H. Tucker, 720 A Street NE.; Mr. E. Francis Riggs, 1311 Massachusetts Avenue; Mr. John Joy Edson, Washington Loan & Trust Co.; Hon. H. B. F. Macfarland, Evans Building; Hon. H. L. West, Washington Herald; Mr. John D. Colpoys, 1382 E Street NE.; Mr. William H. Baldwin, 1415 Twenty-first Street; Mr. Frederick L. Siddons, 701 Bond Building.

The money lenders have importuned the Committee on the District of Columbia to fix the maximum rate at 3 per cent a month, using as an argument that pawnbrokers are permitted to charge that amount. But, as stated above, the committee feels fully satisfied that a maximum of 2 per cent a month is entirely sufficient, and by refusing to except pawnbrokers from this act puts them in the same class as other money lenders who charge more than a legal rate of interest, thereby reducing the amount that they are permitted to charge from 3 per cent to 2 per cent.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, in order that Members here may give careful consideration to this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. KENDALL. Oh, no. We ought to have a quorum here and take up this suspension calendar.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that debate on the motion to adjourn is out of order.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 62, noes 45.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 116, nays 130, answered "present" 4, not voting 136, as follows:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is not recorded.

Mr. PROUTY. I desire to vote. I was called to the telephone just as——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Speaker, am I recorded?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is not recorded.

Mr. CURLEY. I desire to vote in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Was the gentleman in his seat and giving attention when his name was called or should have been called?

Mr. CURLEY. I was not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can not vote.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I am in the same position.

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Speaker, I was present in the Hall, but was not giving attention.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. BARTLETT. I understand the gentleman did not vote. I desire to change my vote. I voted "no."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Call the gentleman's name.

The name of Mr. BUTLER was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

BRIDGE ACROSS BAYOU BARTHOLOMEW, DREW COUNTY, ARK.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11021) to authorize the Levitte Land & Lumber Co. to construct a bridge across Bayou Bartholomew, in Drew County, Ark.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Levitte Land & Lumber Co., a corporation organized and doing business under the laws of the State of Arkansas, and its assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Bayou Bartholomew at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near a point in the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 36, township 13 south, range 4 west, in the county of Drew, in the State of Arkansas, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS ARKANSAS RIVER, PINE BLUFF, ARK.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11022) to authorize the bridge directors of the Jefferson County bridge district to construct a bridge across the Arkansas River at Pine Bluff, Ark.

Be it enacted, etc., That the board of directors of the Jefferson County bridge district be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Arkansas River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near the city of Pine Bluff, in the county of Jefferson and State of Arkansas, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding as a new section the following:

"SEC. 3. That the act entitled 'An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River at Pine Bluff, Ark.,' approved March 5, 1906, is hereby repealed."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON], the author of this bill, is absent. I therefore would like to have an explanation of the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I understand, but this does not prejudice his rights. This bill is to give authority to the directors of the Jefferson County bridge district to build a bridge across this river. In 1906 a bill was passed to construct a bridge across the Arkansas River at Pine Bluff. I suppose it has run out, but it is not desirable to leave on the statute books two laws for the same purpose, although one of the bills may have expired by limitation. This bill takes the place of an old one.

Mr. MACON. And there is no reason why the old one should not be repealed?

Mr. MANN. There is not any reason.

Mr. MACON. Has the gentleman investigated the matter carefully?

Mr. MANN. I will read to the gentleman, among other things, a statement from the War Department. This bill is intended to replace an act approved March 5, 1906, which has expired by limitation.

Mr. MACON. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has just explained to me that he is on the committee and has investigated the matter carefully. I am simply looking after the interests of my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] in his absence.

Mr. MANN. Very properly. The House just refused to adjourn in order to take up these bills for Mr. ROBINSON.

Mr. MACON. It was for that reason that I refused to vote for adjournment myself.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that that motion is dilatory. The House has just voted down the motion.

Mr. SHERLEY. Since then the House has transacted business and it has always been held that such a motion is in order.

Mr. KENDALL. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KENDALL. I desire to inquire if the Calendar for Unanimous Consent has been exhausted?

The SPEAKER. The Calendar for Unanimous Consent has been exhausted.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish the gentleman from Texas would wait until I make a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed and lay it on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the motion to adjourn is dilatory.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bills were just passed and lay those motions on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. And I would like to make a request for unanimous consent, if my brethren will allow.

DISCHARGE OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 772) providing for the physical valuation of the properties of railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is not recognized.

Mr. MADDEN. I make a motion to discharge the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce from further consideration of the bill H. R. 772.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a motion to discharge the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce——

The SPEAKER. All gentlemen will please be seated.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, I lost the floor by sitting down a few minutes ago.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] is recognized.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the motion which is first on the Discharge Calendar, to discharge the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization from further consideration of the bill H. R. 1343, and at the same time I desire to make a point of order that the motion is not properly on the calendar.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Illinois can not call up a motion on the Discharge Calendar placed there by some other member of the committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that the committee in writing the rule originally in the last session of Congress especially provided and framed the rule so that any Member of the House could call up any of these propositions.

Mr. MANN. Let us have a ruling on it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the Chair helped to make that rule, and the Chair rules that anybody in the House can call up any motion on this calendar. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. That is what we want.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the point of order against the motion submitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman is making a point of order himself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. KENDALL. I make the point of order that the motion to which the gentleman from Illinois refers appears to have been filed on the 19th of April——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] made that point of order himself.

Mr. KENDALL (continuing). And that the committee was not appointed until the 11th of April, and that the motion, therefore, is prematurely filed.

Mr. SIMS. That is the point of order that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] was making.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] makes the point of order that the first motion on this calendar, the one of Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts, as to immigration and naturalization, is not in order. The point made is that it is prematurely on the calendar.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman allow the Speaker to state the case?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask whether it is in order for a Member who calls up a matter in the House for consideration to himself make a point of order against it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he never heard of such a thing being done before, or such a point of order being made against it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will permit, I suggest to the Chair that it is impossible for a Member to take the floor for a motion, and then——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for order. We can not hear the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to the Chair that it is impossible, that it is not proper, is not according to proper procedure, for a man to take the floor for the purpose of calling up a bill and then declaring that the bill can not be properly called up. He can not properly destroy his own position on the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the Chair please, the proposition itself is to my mind so clear as to need no more argument than the mere statement of it. The gentleman undertakes to call up a bill. Now, by calling up that bill he by that act declares that the bill is a matter that is proper to be called up, and he can not in the same person and in the same breath both call it up and declare that it can not be called up.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order that when a motion to discharge a committee from the consideration of a bill is called up the Member calling it up can not make a point of order against it.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will state it.

Mr. MURRAY. Is the bill called up by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] properly before the House?

The SPEAKER. That is the very thing that is being determined now.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, if the point of order and the bill can not at the same time be before the House, I rise for the purpose of making the point of order against the consideration of the bill for both the reasons given by the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will permit the Chair to make the ruling, the Chair will recognize the gentleman for the purpose he states. The Chair believes that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, the point of order was made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENDALL].

The SPEAKER. Then the point of order made by the gentleman from Iowa is well taken.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If the gentleman from Iowa withdraws his point of order, I shall renew it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY] is entitled to make it.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, for the reasons advanced by the gentleman from Illinois, I make the point of order that the bill (H. R. 1343) is not properly before the House—for the reason that the allotted time has not been given.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey moves that the House adjourn, and the gentleman from Illinois rises to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest that the ruling just made by the Speaker is rather an important ruling, and that therefore the Speaker might well incorporate the facts in his ruling as it will appear in the RECORD, so that we may have an authoritative record.

The SPEAKER. If the gentlemen will resume their places and give the Chair half a minute, the Chair will state the understanding he entertains about this rule. It is the opinion of the Chair that a bill must have been referred to a committee for 15 days before it would be in order to move to discharge said committee from consideration of said bill. The committees were elected by the House on the 11th day of April, and 11 days plus 15 days, to wit, the 26th of April, would be the earliest day on which said motion could be entered, for in computing the time you can not include both days. This motion was placed on the calendar on April 19. Speaker CANNON held—on May 3, 1909, Sixty-first Congress, first session, page 1689—that until committees were appointed bills and resolutions that had been introduced in the House were not before these committees, and it was not privileged to move to discharge a committee on a resolution of inquiry 7 days after the introduction of such a resolution, as provided for by Rule XXII, clause 5. This discharge rule provides that it shall be in order to move to discharge a committee from further consideration of a bill referred to said committee 15 days prior to the motion. The intention of the rule is to allow the committee 15 days to consider the bill. This rule is a stringent one, and to discharge a committee under it is a reflection on the committee for tardiness of action. To say that the 15 days' notice should begin to run before a committee is in existence would work gross injustice upon such committee. This motion was placed on the Discharge Calendar 8 days after the organization of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, and, in the opinion of the Chair, was prematurely placed thereon. Therefore, the Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order.

Mr. KENDALL. The Chair would include either one, would he not?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Speaker will consult the rule, he will observe that it says nothing about the time of the appointment of the committee, but "when such resolution has been referred to the committee 15 days prior thereto, it shall be in order," and so forth.

The SPEAKER. This is not the first time the Chair has had occasion to study this matter. The Chair thinks it is utterly impossible to refer a bill to a committee that is not in existence.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard briefly on the question of order——

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FITZGERALD. And, Mr. Speaker, if I have been recognized, I hope the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENDALL] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] will sit down.

Mr. KENDALL. I submit that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has not been recognized.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I submit that I have.

Mr. MADDEN. I submit that we have been standing here on the floor trying to get recognition, and the Speaker paid no attention to this side of the House, but every time the opportunity presents itself for him to recognize somebody on the other side he does so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order. The Chair has recognized two Republicans in the last three minutes.

Mr. KENDALL. I wish to make a motion that the House proceed now to take up calendar No. 40.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, a question is pending, and I desire to be heard on it.

Mr. KENDALL Mr. Speaker, I believe I have the floor to make a motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa will state his motion.

Mr. KENDALL. I move that the House proceed to take up calendar No. 40 on the Discharge Calendar, that being the bill H. R. 4416.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make a point of order——

The SPEAKER The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order that it is not in order to move to proceed to take up another bill while there is undisposed of a question of order as to the propriety of the first bill being properly on the calendar.

Mr. KENDALL. That has been disposed of. The Chair ruled it out of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not understand that he had.

Mr. KENDALL. The gentleman must be more alert than that.

The SPEAKER The House will be in order. The Chair can not hear anything that is going on, and nobody else can. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to make his point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Has the Chair determined the first question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has determined the first question, and that is that these motions are not in order unless 15 days elapsed after the 11th day of April, and you can not count the 11th day of April and the day that a bill is put on the calendar, both.

Mr. KENDALL. A parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move to call up No. 2, which is a preferential motion to the one submitted by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. KENDALL. I submit that my motion was presented to the House and was pending, and the gentleman can not take me off the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is mistaken about that. Nobody has been recognized to make any motion since the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] made his motion.

Mr. KENDALL. Now, that being true——

Mr. SABATH. Has the Speaker sustained the point of order?

The SPEAKER. The point of order was sustained.

Mr. SABATH. Then, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up motion No. 2, to discharge the Committee on Invalid Pensions from further consideration of House bill 767.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

The SPEAKER. The rule is this: Recognition for such motions shall be in the order in which they have been entered. The motion called up by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] is the second one on this list of motions.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Against that I make the point of order that the motion was not on the calendar the required time under the rule. The rule requires the motion to be filed 15 days after the bill is referred to a committee. The committees were appointed on the 11th day of April, and it appears that this motion was filed on the 25th day of April, less than 15 days after.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MADDEN. And on that motion, Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. ANSBERRY rose and addressed the Chair.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Speaker, pending the yeas and nays, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio, whose motion this is, is not present in the House; that the last time he was here he said that he had missed some papers that he deemed necessary to raise the question of personal privilege; that he is out looking for them; and as a matter of common courtesy to a colleague I think we ought to wait until he is present to defend his position. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is out of order. The yeas and nays have been ordered on a motion to adjourn.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 146, nays 113, answered "present" 5, not voting 122, as follows:

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the announcement of the vote, Mr. LATTA, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence indefinitely on account of sickness.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

ADJOURNMENT.

Accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, August 8, 1911, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 13276) to provide for the disposal of the present Federal building site at Newark, Ohio, and for the purchase of a new site for such building, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 127), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 2932) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to sell the old post-office and courthouse building at Charleston, W. Va., and, in the event of such sale, to enter into a contract for the construction of a suitable post office and courthouse at Charleston, W. Va., without additional cost to the Government of the United States, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 128), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 2055) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a new public building at Bangor, Me., also for the sale of the site and ruins of the former post-office building, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 130), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. FINLEY, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the concurrent resolution of the Senate (S. Con. Res. 2) to print copies of Bulletin No. 30 of the Bureau of American Ethnology, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 129), which said resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SPARKMAN, from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 943) to improve navigation on Black Warrior River, in the State of Alabama, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 133), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HEFLIN, from the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions, to which was referred the joint resolution of the House (H. J. Res. 99) authorizing the President to invite the Republic of Mexico and the Republics of Central and South America to participate in the Panama-California Exposition in 1915 at San Diego, Cal., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 131), which said resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12714) granting a pension to Gustav J. Tichy, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. SHEPPARD: A bill (H. R. 13367) to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes," approved May 27, 1908, by striking out certain words from the clause authorizing a new building for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. RODDENBERY: A bill (H. R. 13368) to amend the immigration laws of United States and to further restrict and prohibit the admission of undesirable immigrants and aliens; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas: A bill (H. R. 13369) increasing the cost of erecting a public building at Hope, Ark.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. KORBLY: Resolution (H. Res. 267) to investigate concerning action of Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Park Commission relative to changing and removal of various monuments and markers on battle field of Missionary Ridge, Tenn.; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 146) for appointment of a member of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SABATH: Concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 15) to print 17,100 copies of proceedings of unveiling the statues of Pulaski and Kosciuszko; to the Committee on Printing.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin: A bill (H. R. 13370) granting an increase of pension to Harmon L. Palmer; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CLARK of Missouri: A bill (H. R. 13371) granting an increase of pension to James W. Hollenbeck; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CLINE: A bill (H. R. 13372) granting an increase of pension to J. H. Weaver; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DICKINSON: A bill (H. R. 13373) granting an increase of pension to John C. Bridges; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HAWLEY: A bill (H. R. 13374) granting an increase of pension to Isaac Cram; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. JACOWAY: A bill (H. R. 13375) for the relief of the heirs of John Deering and John Edwards; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. LEE of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 13376) to correct the military record of Thomas J. Rose; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LEWIS: A bill (H. R. 13377) to refund to the corporate authorities of Frederick City, Md., the sum of $200,000, exacted of them by the Confederate Army under Gen. Jubal Early, July 9, 1864, under penalty of burning said city; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. ANTHONY: A bill (H. R. 13378) granting an increase of pension to Thomas J. Thompson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MATTHEWS: A bill (H. R. 13379) granting an increase of pension to Andrew McCullough; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. O'SHAUNESSY: A bill (H. R. 13380) granting a pension to Sarah E. Hall; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13381) granting an increase of pension to Annie Potter Newell; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13382) granting an increase of pension to Mary Kennedy; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13383) granting an increase of pension to Susan Douglas; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13384) granting an increase of pension to Nicholas E. Gardiner; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13385) granting an increase of pension to Abbie S. Lawrence; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13386) granting an increase of pension to Eliza W. Parkhurst; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. STEPHENS of California: A bill (H. R. 13387) granting an increase of pension to Edwin M. Wardall; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WICKLIFFE: A bill (H. R. 13388) for the relief of the estate of Le Roy C. Morris, deceased; to the Committee on War Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ANSBERRY: Resolution of District Grand Lodge No. 2, Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, relative to the treatment of Jewish citizens by the Russian Government; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin: Papers to accompany bill granting an increase of pension to Harmon L. Palmer; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CURLEY: Petition of H. M. Aitken and numerous others, of Boston, Brookline, and Dorchester, Mass., asking that the duty on raw and refined sugars be reduced; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, resolution of District Grand Lodge No. 2, Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, relative to the treatment of Jewish citizens by the Russian Government; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. ESCH: Resolution of District Grand Lodge No. 2, Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, relative to the treatment by the Russian Government of Jewish citizens; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. FULLER: Petition of the American National Live Stock Association and of the Cattle Raisers' Association, of Texas, in opposition to placing live stock and meats on the free list; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of the Old Age Brotherhood for the enactment of an old-age pension system; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MATTHEWS: Papers in support of bill to increase pension of Andrew McCullough; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SULZER: Resolution of District Grand Lodge No. 2, Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, relative to the treatment of Jewish citizens by the Russian Government; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, August 8, 1911.

[Continuation of legislative day of Monday, August 7, 1911.]

The Senate met, at the expiration of the recess, at 11 o'clock a. m., Tuesday, August 8, 1911.

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 14) to admit the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona as States into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the first amendment reported from the Committee on Territories. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] has the floor.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, this is a Republic. It is not a pure democracy; it is a Republic. It is not a government by the people direct, but it is a representative government. One would think from some of the contentions made here that we are seriously contemplating in this country a revolution under which we are about to precipitate ourselves into a pure democracy and eliminate the representative feature of our Government entirely, or to so control it that representative government will have in itself no longer any force or any effect.

The recall of judges, as it is proposed in the constitution of Arizona and presented by argument upon this floor, is a proposal to put into the hands of a small minority the power to involve an incumbent of a judicial office in a fight for his position as a judge, by merely filing a petition signed, not by a majority of the voters, not by one-half of the voters, but by one-fourth of the voters—a petition which need not state specifically a single charge against that judge. He will be compelled thereby to go to the people of his district and fight for his retention in his judicial office in the very midst of the term for which he has already been lawfully chosen.

I do not say that a provision of that kind takes away from a State its republican form of government, but I do say that such a provision is unrepublican and that it is a startling step toward pure democracy.

The fathers who framed the Constitution are dismissed nowadays by some people with a sneer. It is said that they framed our Constitution in secret, and that itself put a color of suspicion upon the organic law; that when you look now at the men who framed that charter, you find that they, in their true colors, were reactionaries and standpatters. No longer are Benjamin Franklin and George Washington and Alexander Hamilton men to whom we should look for light and guidance in the construction of the Constitution; they are under suspicion of having covertly, in secret, gone into some kind of conspiracy against their race, and the future, in the interest of property and corporations and that sort of thing. This is the kind of argument we hear at the beginning of the twentieth century about the Constitution of our country.

The words of Mr. Hamilton when he was presenting the claims of the Constitution to ratification are just as true to-day as they were then. He said:

> Give all power to the many and they will oppress the few.

Does anybody deny that now? What did he say about the minority?

> Give all power to the few and they will oppress the many.

Does anybody deny that now? No. Some would say, "We do not want to give any power to the few, but we do want to give all power to the many." But one proposition is just as dangerous as the other. Hamilton said:

> Both, therefore, ought to have the power that each may defend itself against the other.

Oh no, Mr. President, that is not to be the doctrine now. Both are not to have the power by which each can defend itself against the other, but the power of the minority is to be taken from it and the entire power is to be vested in the many, which he said would oppress the few. A strange doctrine this which is now declared before the American people upon the floor of the United States Senate.

"No," said Mr. Hamilton:

The complete independence of the courts of justice is peculiarly essential to a limited constitution. By a limited constitution I understand one which contains certain specified exceptions to the legislative authority, such, for instance, as that it shall pass no bills of attainder, no ex post facto laws, and the like.

What is to become of your Bill of Rights if the courts are not to be independent in protecting the citizen in each one of them and if the bar is to be thrown down and all left to the majority? The Bill of Rights was written in letters of blood to protect the individual against tyranny, but it is now proposed to throw down these barriers because the power in the hands of the few to protect themselves against the many is to be swept away; the majority is to have the power under the recall, or something of that kind, to intimidate the only tribunal under our system which can protect a minority and give it a hearing.

What other tribunal is there under our system which can give the minority any protection except the judicial department of the Government? I want no weapon placed in the hands of a majority, without even a specification, with nothing but an arbitrary dictum, with which to sweep away the independence of the only department in existence which can protect the few against the many and the many against the few.

Mr. Hamilton goes on:

Limitations of this kind can be preserved in practice in no other way than through the courts of justice, whose duty it must be to declare all acts contrary to the manifest intent of the Constitution void.

It is said upon this floor that it was usurpation upon the part of the Supreme Court of the United States to assume to declare that an act of Congress because it was repugnant to this great charter is void, and that the men who made such decisions were, in effect, guilty of treason and violated the Constitution by upholding it. If some declarations I have heard in the Senate are true, John Marshall ought to have been impeached; yea, more, he was open to the charge of treason when he decided the great cases of Marbury v. Madison, McCulloch v. Maryland, Cohens v. Virginia, Gibbons v. Ogden, and the Dartmouth College case, in all of which decisions he wrote in large letters, it is said, into the Constitution the word NATION. If what we hear said here on the floor of the Senate be true, instead of construing the Constitution according to its spirit, so that a great nation might live throughout all the future, Marshall was guily of a willful usurpation of unwarranted power, and he ought to have been recalled.

That is the kind of doctrine proclaimed now upon the floor of the Senate. Fine doctrine this to proclaim from here to the American people!

Mr. Hamilton also said:

Without this all the reservation of particular rights or privileges would amount to nothing. This independence of the judges is equally requisite to guard the Constitution and the rights of the individuals from the effect of those ill humors which the arts of designing men or the influence of particular junctures sometimes disseminate among the public themselves and which, though they speedily give place to better information and more deliberate reflection, have a tendency in the meantime to occasion dangerous innovations in the Government and serious oppression of the minority party in the community.

That doctrine is not believed in nowadays by some people, but, thank God, they are few. It is not believed by some people who denounce the man who wrote this as an aristocrat and a monarchical sympathizer.

No man was denounced more in his day than Mr. Marshall. No more angry and ugly and venomous and malicious assaults were ever hurled at the head of a public official than were hurled at the head of that great man whom we now reverence. If he could have been placed at the power of the excited, tumultuous, impassioned crowd which thought the decision in Cohens v. Virginia was usurpation he would have been recalled. He would have been hurled from the place which he adorned and which he made great. He would have been taken from the great position which he filled during so many years of his long life and in which he, more than any other man in the history of this Nation, helped to build it or make it possible to build it.

With some people this language of Mr. Hamilton is not popular. He goes on:

Upon the whole there can be no room to doubt that the convention acted wisely in copying from the models of those constitutions which had established good behavior as the tenure of their judicial officers in point of duration, and that so far from being blamable on this account their plan would have been inexcusably defective if it had wanted this important feature of good government. The experience of good government affords an illustrious comment upon the excellence of the institution.

Mr. President, Mr. Hamilton was not the only one to take this view of the matter. Mr. Madison expressed himself about a pure democracy when he was giving his opinion of the Constitution and the judiciary. He said:

From this view of the subject, it may be concluded that a pure democracy, by which I mean a society consisting of a small number of citizens, who assemble and administer the government in person, can permit of no cure for the mischiefs of faction.

Certainly not; the majority there is the tyrant, if there be a tyrant.

But what did he say further?

A common passion or interest will, in almost every case, be felt by a majority of the whole; a communication and concert result from the form of government itself; and there is nothing to check the inducements to sacrifice the weaker party or an obnoxious individual.

That is exactly true. Who questions the truth of this declaration of Mr. Madison? It is the mere brutal power of numbers unrestrained, unchecked, no guaranties anywhere for the minority that is the basis of such a government—a pure democracy. He says:

There is nothing to check the inducements to sacrifice the weaker party or an obnoxious individual.

But, Mr. President, another doctrine is being preached nowadays for the government of 90,000,000 of people and a Nation, which in numbers and in territorial extent, is one of the greatest empires of the world. All these safeguards are to be broken down—for this is the first step in that direction—and the brutal control of the majority is to be installed and placed in absolute control of the judgments and decrees of its courts.

So long as I have a voice and a will and a conviction and this kind of doctrine is preached, to the utmost of my strength I shall oppose it in the United States Senate and elsewhere. It is revolutionary. It is bad. Mr. Madison goes on:

A republic, by which I mean a government in which the scheme of representation takes place, opens a different prospect and promises the cure for which we are seeking.

Some men do not believe that nowadays. The American people, however, do believe it, as we shall find out when the question comes fairly before them.

In 1894, following that great riot and mob in Chicago, where the crowd undertook to take from the United States the power to carry its own mails, a cry went out before this country that it was governed by injunction. That cry went into the campaign as an issue, and more than any other contributing cause that revolutionary cry defeated the Democratic Party. We welcome the issue again. If you want to go before the American people preaching disorder, anarchy, the breaking down of restraints, disintegration, the undermining of the courts, you are welcome to all you can make out of it. Try it if you must. I would like to be on the firing line in a fight of that kind.

Mr. Madison says:

The scheme of representation in a republican form takes the place and pronounces the cure for which we are seeking. The two great points of difference between a democracy and a republic are, first, the delegation of the government in the latter to a small number of citizens elected by the rest.

That is a republican form of government made by those men who we are now told sat in secret and conspired against the people in the interest of property; that is the way they are characterized by some people now; that is the kind of talk we hear in the Senate about them now. The fathers also had before them the words of Montesquieu:

There is no liberty if the judicial power be not separated from the legislative and executive. Were it joined with the legislative, the life and liberty of the subject would be exposed to arbitrary control, for the judge would then be the legislator. Were it joined to the executive power, the judge might behave with violence and oppression. There would be an end of everything were the same men or the same body to exercise these three powers: That of enacting laws, that of executing them, and that of trying the cases of individuals.

Are these divisions to be now broken down? This judicial department, these judges, stand in the breach and see that the most unfortunate and the weakest individual in the Nation shall have all of his rights—guaranteed to him under the Declaration of Independence as well as by the Constitution—the right to life, to liberty, and to the pursuit of happiness. The judge, now absolutely free in adjudging these rights, will, under this new proposal, exercise his duty with the menace of the mob hanging over him. If he does not enter into the passions of the majority, if he does not enter into their sympathies, if he does not become a part of their impulses, if he does not obey their will, they are to have a weapon with which they can punish him. They may recall him.

Oh, we are preaching strange doctrine here. Who is demanding this? I know it is not demanded by the great mass of the people with whom I have come in contact; it is not demanded by the farmers on our prairies; it is not demanded by the merchants in our stores; it is not demanded by the average citizen of this country, if I have any acquaintance with him at all. Who is demanding it? Certain things happen every once in a while. It is too solemn and too awful for me to say who is responsible for it, but every once in a while dynamite is put under great mills and great properties and great newspapers and they are torn to fragments, and limbs and arms of fathers are thrown into the air, widows are made, little children are left fatherless, and generally somewhere affiliated with conduct of that kind—I do not say responsible for it; that would be too awful and too sweeping—but somehow as an incident, or it is an incident to certain kinds of disputes, and one side in these disputes is asking for this recall of judges as one kind of a remedy. I propose to speak plain English here. One side in a controversy of this kind is asking for a remedy like this. There is where it comes from.

In Chicago, after that riot in 1894, one class of people denounced the President of the United States because he insisted on using the power of the United States to enable the Government to do the business of the United States. The people who denounced President Cleveland then would like to have a recall of judges. Let us talk plainly about this. You want to put judges at the mercy of passion, impulse, and excitement like that; I do not; and my arm will be palsied and fall helpless to my side when I refuse to protest against any influence of this kind being brought to bear upon the courts of this country.

What is this talk about "faith in the people"? Ah, we hear a lot of it. When a man protests against this sort of thing, immediately it is said to him: "We have faith in the people, and you are lacking in faith in the people." I do not stand second to any Member of this Senate in advocating faith in the people; but who are the people? Is the majority the people? Is the majority, wrought up and excited in tumult, the people? I am going to talk plainly—you may think it is almost brutal—about the majorities that sometimes assume that they are the people.

Over in good conservative old Delaware, settled by American pure bloods and peopled by their descendants generation after generation, a few years ago in the city of Wilmington a negro was charged with a serious and awful crime. There was no delay of the courts connected with it. He was speedily tried; he was convicted; he was sentenced to the gallows. He was waiting simply for the sheriff to execute the decree of the court. Just let me read what the father of the victim said to the mob as he sat beside the bier where his daughter lay dead:

> Our cup of bitterness is full, but we ask you to join us in our appeal to all citizens of our Commonwealth to refrain from violence.

Mr. President, what did those American citizens do? They went to the jail and broke through five steel gates; they hammered them down; they went into that jail and they took that man who had been convicted by a jury, who had been sentenced to death by the court, out onto the commons; they kindled a fire; they put him to death by slow torture; they danced around the burning corpse like wild savages; and after their awful deed was done, they cut off the toes and fingers and distributed them in the crowd as mementoes of their barbarism.

Talk to me about the majority of the people always being trusted. God knows I have faith in the people—in all the people, the whole people, in their mature deliberations, in their final verdict—but these same people ought to have some restraint built up under which even a poor criminal like that shall be protected against the assault, the impulse, and the passion of the fleeting, shifting majority of the moment. I am going to talk plainly, even if it may seem brutal. Some one ought to speak out against all this cant and this preaching about faith in the people to cover up an attempt to put in the hands of an angry, shifting, fleeting majority the power to overawe and menace the courts of the country. Fine doctrine that.

Mr. President, Cincinnati is a great city, a city of culture, a city of art, a city of music, a city of refinement, a city of wealth. I have here a statement written by Mr. J. S. Tunnison, of Cincinnati, a conservative, calm, dispassionate statement, made by a man of ability, made by a close observer, made by a man who was on the ground, in which he describes the Cincinnati riot of 1888. Talk to me about having faith in the majority under some circumstances and use the general cry "faith in the people" to prevent looking a situation like this that Mr Tunnison describes squarely in the face! No. Let us pull the mask off. Mr. Tunnison says that a man named Berner was accused of the crime of murder. It was not an offense against a woman; it was the murder of another man, ignorant like himself.

Berner was arrested; he was tried speedily; he was convicted; he was sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment in the penitentiary—not an inadequate punishment. There had been an orderly trial, an orderly sentence, a vindication of the law. One night soon after this sentence was imposed a crowd gathered on the street. They had a meeting over in one of the halls; a few inflammatory speeches were made—I call the attention of Senators on the other side to the fact that the judges were elected by the people; they were not appointed during good behavior, but they were part of the elective system in Ohio—a few inflammatory speeches were made, and, like a torch, the flame spread into the crowd in the street below, and for nearly one week there was a reign of terror in the city of Cincinnati, the city of culture, of art, of music, and of wealth. The police were intimidated, the people who loved law and order were driven off the streets, and the mob was enthroned almost as completely as it was in the city of Paris during the days of the Revolution. The courthouse, a magnificent and beautiful classical structure that cost millions of dollars, was destroyed, burned up by this mob. Innocent men were shot down in the streets and pandemonium reigned.

Do you want that kind of a crowd to circulate a petition for the recall of the only officer, outside of the governor of the State, clothed with authority to maintain law and order under such circumstances? Do you want him placed under the menace of a crowd like that by being subjected to a recall if he dare put in force some decree or order against it?

There is no part of the United States exempt from occasional outbreaks of this kind. We in the North have no right to look down across Mason and Dixon's line and criticize our neighbors on account of the fact that tumults and riots arise there, because they arise in South Dakota and in Idaho, in Colorado, in California, in Kansas, in Delaware, and in all the States.

I had been practicing law only a couple of years after I first went to the Territory of Dakota when a murder occurred in the county in which I lived. The man guilty of it was arrested, brought over, and put in our county jail in the county seat town where I lived. On the Monday following court convened. One of the best judges in heart and in integrity that ever lived was to preside. The grand jury met, an indictment was drawn, there was no question about the conviction of the man; but on the following morning, when I arrived at my office down the street, the corpse of that defendant was hanging to the flagpole immediately in front of the courthouse, almost under its eaves, and at a time when the court was being held.

Do not talk to me as though there was only one side to this question in this country. Some one ought to speak out when everybody is crying—and there is contagion in the cry—"faith in the people." I have faith in the people; I have faith in all the people; I believe vox populi, vox Dei; but it is the deliberate voice of all the people, not the voice of an angry, excited, tumultous, shifting, temporary majority of the people; and I denounce with all the earnestness I possess these cries of "faith in the people" which conceal and cover situations like these I have described.

They say Judge Walter Clark, of North Carolina, is a radical. All right. Let me give you some facts he published about these mobs. My radical friends, listen to it when you are preaching your professions of faith in the people. Faith in the people! We all have faith in the people, in the deliberate judgment of all the people, but faith in an excited majority, a tumultuous majority, an enraged majority, a temporary majority, a shifting majority—faith to the extent which would put into the hands of that temporary and shifting and angry majority the power to destroy the independence of the courts? No; never, so help me God; never. Such blind worshipping idolatry of the majority as that? Never.

Judge Walter Clark gives the statistics. He gives the number of lynchings that occurred in the United States, as shown by a report issued previous to the time he wrote this article, and he shows that in the United States, according to the State official reports for 1892, the last which had been compiled when he wrote the article, which was published some time ago, there were 107 executions by process of law for homicides and all other capital offenses and 236 by lynching, while for the 10 years, 1883–1892, the average was more than 2 executed by lynching to 1 by law. He also stated that it appeared from a recent message of the governor of North Carolina that 8 persons were executed by lynching during his term while only 5 were executed by the sheriff.

Yet we hear this sentimental, nonsensical talk here—I call it that, because I believe that is the right name for it—about faith in the people as a justification for a proposal to destroy the independence of the courts. If Senators on this floor are influenced by such talk it shows how courts and judges may be weak enough to listen to it if the fate of judges is placed in such a balance.

Let us save them, God help us; let us save them as long as we can from any such influence as this.

When it is asserted here that the people are supreme, that they employ judges and stand toward them in the relation of a master toward a servant what is meant is the majority of the people. Listen to what Hannis Taylor says in a recent article:

> Herein lies the error. The judges are not the servants and agents of the majority. The judges are the servants of both the majority and the minority, and must of necessity be independent.

I read somewhere—and I have made a little note of it—how one time an angry, excited, tumultuous crowd swarmed about the gates of Westminster Hall and sought to influence Lord Mansfield in a decision he was about to render; they told him that if his decision should be so and so he would be the most popular judge in England. He faced the angry crowd and said:

> I wish popularity, but it is that popularity which follows and not that which is run after. It is that popularity which sooner or later never fails to do justice to the pursuit of noble ends.

He held fast to his integrity and made his decision without heeding the cries of that angry multitude. That is the kind of incentive we want in our judges, not the influence or fear of the crowd.

Now, Mr. President, I said last evening that I believe in popular government. I believe in the popular government we have in my State, where we have the initiative and the referendum. I believe, however, these provisions are weapons designed to be used not for the purpose of taking direct charge of the Government, but as a weapon of protection, to be used only in emergencies; they were put into our fundamental law for that purpose, to be used in that way only. I am absolutely in favor of them. I do not believe the referendum should be allowed upon a petition signed by only 5 per cent of the voters—only one-twentieth of the voters being given the power to invoke this remedy, and thereby hang up and suspend the operation of what may be a very valuable and useful law, because, perchance, the American Express Co. or some other special interest does not want it to go into effect. That is done sometimes.

Let us look at both sides of it. I think the petition should be signed by a larger number than 5 per cent, but I am heartily in favor of the remedy as an emergency weapon, and I would oppose its repeal; so would the people of South Dakota.

But how far are we going? There is a proposition in my State now to have what they call a party recall. What do you think of that? The theory of it is that when the officer is elected and installed he is a tool and instrument of the party which elected him, and the other people are to have nothing to say about it. If a certain percentage of the people belonging to his party petition for his recall, then he must submit to their dictation, having bound himself by written pledge to resign his office. Where are we going when men are found who seriously propose such schemes of partisan control over public officers as that?

The majority, the deliberate majority, of this country will never agree to such propositions as these. The deliberate, thoughtful majority of this country will hold to these constitutional restraints upon the action of the impassioned, hasty, impulsive, temporary, shifting majority. Our fathers believed in them, and we will continue to believe in them no matter how many extremists may preach a different doctrine. You can not carry a State in this Union, after deliberate and fearless discussion, in favor of any such revolutionary proposal as this recall of judges, in my opinion.

Now, I think, Mr. President, I have uttered my protest pretty emphatically. I believe those who think as I do ought to utter an emphatic protest.

But you ask me what am I going to do about the resolution admitting Arizona. I confess I never had a more difficult question to settle with myself. Much as I oppose the principle of putting the recall of judges into the constitution of Arizona or into any other State constitution—and if such a proposition were proposed in my State I would travel over it and protest against it everywhere—this question comes up to me: If the people in Arizona wish to put into their organic law something that I believe they should not, and yet something which they can lawfully put there and which is a matter they must determine for themselves, why should I say they shall not do so?

They may have had troubles there. They have been living under a carpetbag government. Senators from the South know what it is to live under a carpetbag government. So do I. I began my practice in a Territory where every judge before whom I tried cases came into the Territory with a commission in his pocket. He had no common interest with us. He was there to serve a term and go back at the end to his home in the East; and if ever I had experience with snobs, arbitrary and petty tyrants, who thought they owed nothing to the people of the Territory or to anyone on earth except to the power which appointed them, it was with these carpetbag judges.

Arizona may have had an experience of that kind; I do not know. It may be that experience of that kind explains why they have been tempted to put this dangerous provision into their constitution.

If Congress should admit Arizona into the Union with this constitution which provides that their nisi prius judges shall be elected for only two years, with the power of impeachment, they certainly do not need any such remedy as this.

But they appear to want it, and I am disposed to let them have it, after making my protest against it. I give that as the explanation for my vote, notwithstanding my earnest denunciation of this principle.

But what is the reason for asking for the recall of judges all around over the United States? The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] printed a list of the States, showing that they all have provisions for impeachment, and the great majority of them have provisions for the removal of judges by the governor upon the address of the legislature supported by a two-thirds vote. It is very seldom that existing remedies are invoked, and they say, "This will never be invoked." If it never will be invoked, what do they want it for? It is the extreme cases in which it may be invoked that measure the danger. If they come only once in 50 years, it may be in a case in which it will be an awful weapon in the hands of an infuriated crowd. We must consider that in measuring its danger. That is why I oppose it.

Mr. President, I have talked with a good deal of energy and emphasis here, but I make no apology for it. It is because I have been trying, not in polished and finished phrase, but with earnestness, to faithfully express the convictions of my innermost heart. Having done that, Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. CLAPP obtained the floor.

Mr. THORNTON. If the Senator from Minnesota will yield to me for a temporary interruption, not exceeding five minutes, I will be very much obliged.

Mr. CLAPP. I yield with pleasure to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I had not expected to say anything on the subject under discussion and would not do so now if it had not been for the statement made on the floor of this Chamber yesterday by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] to the effect that every vote by a Senator in favor of the admission of Arizona with a constitution as it is now presented to us signified that Senator's approval of the recall of judges, and every vote cast by a Senator against the admission of Arizona signified his disapproval of the recall of judges. Inasmuch as I do not favor the recall of judges, but do intend to vote for the admission of Arizona with that feature in her constitution, I can not permit that statement to pass unchallenged.

I am perfectly sure that my opposition to the recall of judges is quite as sincere as is the opposition of the Senator from New York. But I am also sure that I have not the right, because of my objection to that feature of the Arizona constitution, to deny statehood to that Territory on account of my disapproval of a measure which has the approval of the people of that Territory and which affects her citizens only and which does not violate any provision of the Constitution of the United States.

In the closing days of the last Congress, when this measure was submitted to the Senate, I voted for the admission of Arizona with that feature in her constitution, and I did so for the reasons I have just stated.

On my return to this extra session I found on my desk a letter from the nonpartisan statehood committee thanking me for my attitude on that matter, and I at once replied that my vote must not be construed as an approval of the recall feature of their constitution, because I did not approve of it; but it should be construed as a recognition of the rights of the people of Arizona to make their own constitution according to what they thought was best for their own people, and I would continue to recognize that right just as long as the question came up before the Senate. Later on I was waited on by a delegation from that committee, and to them I repeated verbally what I had previously written.

If my own State enacted a law which concerned her citizens only and did not contravene any provision of the Constitution of the United States, I would resent the attempt of any outside body to invalidate that law because it did not agree with their individual opinion. I consider that the people of Arizona have in this respect an equal right with the people of Louisiana. I can justify to myself my vote for the admission of Arizona as a State containing this measure, but I could not justify to myself my vote against the admission of that Territory as a State because it contained a measure not meeting with my personal approval, but solemnly and deliberately enacted by the people of that Territory, believing it to be for their best interests.

For these reasons I shall vote against the Nelson amendment.

I thank the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, this debate, as usual in the Senate, has finally taken a very wide range. We have been treated at one extreme with the reproduction of the French Revolution with all its horrors, portrayed with a rapidity and vividness suggestive of a modern moving-picture panorama, apparently unmindful of the great historic truth that revolutions are simply the fruits of delayed reforms. At the other extreme we have been treated to the picture of incongruous, absolutely impossible situations, with a seriousness on the part of the artist which would really indicate that the artist regarded as possible that which is not only improbable but also impossible.

Divested of these extraneous matters and relieved somewhat from the hysteria which I must, in candor and frankness, admit I can but believe has been in part inspired for a purpose, the question before the Senate is whether the Senate, so far as it has the authority, shall admit the Territory of Arizona with a constitution to the liking of the people of Arizona, or whether we, assuming a superior knowledge and coming from various States of the Union, but none of us from Arizona, shall arrogate to ourselves to say what shall be wise for Arizona, and by mere brute force compel the citizens of that prospective State to surrender the rights of freemen and adopt a constitution in consonance not with the views of the people of Arizona but to conform to the views of men who never have and probably many never will even cast a shadow within the confines of Arizona.

I must refer to the situation which exists ordinarily in Territories. The first settlers of a Territory present a picture that appeals to the average American citizen. There is something grand and heroic about the real pioneers. They carry, in a certain sense, their lives in their hands. They are the pioneers who blaze the pathway for the civilization which is to follow. It is a striking tribute to the lawmaking genius of the Anglo-Saxon that the first wave of pioneer life, in advance of the legislature and in advance of the courts, establishes a condition of law and order where justice, without the refinements that are later wrought out in our judicial system, is administered with a broad and liberal spirit, with a fairness seldom equaled when all the complicated machinery of government has followed in the wake of the pioneer.

Following the real pioneer, when population is dense enough to form a Territory, there come two great generic classes of people. There is an inviting field in the Territory for the man who is of constructive genius, who goes there not alone to build himself a home but to develop a waste and make it blossom as one of the flowers of civilization.

Accompanying that, along another line, there is another class of men who find an inviting field in the Territory. They are the men who believe that in public service they may really serve the public, and they seek the political opportunities of a Territory.

But, unfortunately, in this world the evil seems to mingle with the good, and accompanying these somewhat venturesome but decently inspired streams of immigration there follow two others. First, the lawyer who has outworn his welcome in convention and court and must find a new field for exploitation. Under the benign influence of patronage he is appointed to a position in the new Territory. In view of his somewhat frayed and tattered reputation, one would think that the appointing power was inspired by a generous impulse to make a return for past services. But although this lawyer has outworn his welcome in convention and in court, he can still in the livery of heaven serve the devil as a Territorial judge.

Let me digress to say that upon the bench in some of these Territories there are men who, less conspicuous in their field of operation, have displayed as high and inspiring an impulse and devotion to the public as any man upon any judicial bench. But, unfortunately, the Territory has become the dumping ground for the worn-out, played-out lobbyist.

Following in his wake and along with him there is the politician who not only has worn out his welcome at conventions, but has worn out his welcome even with the people. He must find a resting place, and he is dumped into the Territory.

In view of his somewhat depleted political capital, one at first glance would think that the appointing power that gave him this reward was actuated by a spirit of generous regard for past services. Far from it, for although he is somewhat shattered, he is still literally "in the ring"; he can still serve the same master mind, in the background, in the Territory, by appearing as a formidable adjunct in local, and in securing delegates to national, conventions.

Associated with these two benevolent individuals there is another form of citizen who invades the Territory as a field for exploitation, and that is the man who is the servant of the big master, but the master of the small servants—the man who is in touch with great and important interests. He seeks the Territory not to make a home, not that the wilderness may blossom, but that he may exploit the resources of the Territory, material and political. He finds and, by the natural kinship of the vicious, recognizes his allies.

These three forces form as unconscionable a bunch of commercial and political plunderers as ever oozed up through the seepage of our complex civilization. New Mexico and Arizona were no exception to the common fate of Territories, and they were not without this plunderbund exploiting itself in both those Territories.

It has been said the time has come when we should speak plainly upon this floor; and without any unnecessary zeal, seeking to avoid the possibilities of exaggerated expression, I propose to deal with this subject to-day without gloves. The genesis of the pending resolution is as follows:

Some time ago Congress passed a law known as enabling acts, providing that the people of New Mexico and Arizona might call constitutional conventions for the purpose of creating constitutions that they might be admitted to the Federal Union. The fact that Congress passed these enabling acts amounted to a decision by Congress that the Territories were sufficiently populated and the people were capable of self-government, and so far as these two questions were concerned were entitled to be admitted to the Union. So that phase of the question is eliminated from any further discussion.

The plunderbund is always a small minority in a Territory. The trouble is that the man who has gone to the Territory to make himself a home; the man who has gone there permanently—having no participation in the political affairs of that Territory except within a very limited scope—is not encouraged to participate in political affairs; but this group I have described have nothing else on earth to do except to look after the politics of the Territory. Then they are backed with the prestige of the powers, both political and commercial, behind them. So a minority small numerically becomes, at times, an overshadowing force in the machinery of legislation and political methods. This is too true even as to States, but especially so in a Territory, where the lessened participation lessens interest.

Under this law to authorize the gathering of these constitutional conventions, New Mexico held a convention. I do not know how it happened; it may be that the population of New Mexico is more scattered; that it can not exercise itself in such a concrete form as the population of Arizona. All I do know is that, judged by the character of the New Mexico constitution, judged by the avidity with which it was approvingly hailed by every friend of special privilege, it was very evident that this plunderbund had succeeded to an overshadowing extent in framing the New Mexico constitution. In saying this I would not discredit or minimize the fact that there are thousands of good, loyal, home-seeking, well-meaning citizens in New Mexico; but in some way they were unable to cope with the forces arrayed against them.

The enabling act in each case provided that when the constitution came to Washington it should be submitted to Congress and the President. Congress might approve it; the President might approve it. If the President did accept it, then if Congress did not affirmatively disapprove it before the end of the next regular session it would become a valid enactment.

The New Mexico constitution met the approval of the President, but the Arizona constitution did not.

Now we turn to the conditions in Arizona. The distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] yesterday used an illustration in describing the genesis of free government when he referred to the Battle of Concord and the Battle of Lexington. As I recall history, the "embattled farmers" of Lexington and Concord risked their lives not to keep from the people the right of government, but to give the right of government to the people, yet the Senator used this illustration in an argument against the pending resolution.

It so happened that in Arizona they were more quickly aroused; they were able to more quickly come together as a concrete force, at all events; and the well-meaning people of Arizona triumphed. They made popular government the issue in the election of the convention which submitted a constitution to the people, a constitution which gives the people the fullest possible direct participation in State government, and after a campaign of unusual interest they adopted the constitution almost four to one. Their proposed constitution did not meet the approval of the special interests nor their political allies.

I want to refer for a moment to the struggle of those people in their courageous effort which resulted in securing their proposed constitution. I know something of it, because it has been my fortune to be more or less in communication with them. Many of them are personal acquaintances of mine.

When the question came up for the establishment of a constitutional convention in Arizona the power of the men who sought to exploit the Territory for selfish purposes, political and commercial, was arrayed against the men who were fighting for self-government. I am reliably informed that a Cabinet officer of the Government entered the Territory of Arizona and threw the weight and prestige of his great office in conjunction with the plunderbund, in its efforts to prevent the voters of Arizona from adopting a constitution in the interest of the people of that Territory. They were threatened by the great corporations operating there that pending and contemplated development would cease in the Territory. I have been reliably informed that a representative of the Government pointed one of the editors of Arizona who was favoring the constitution to the site whereon it had been decided to place a public building, and suggestively inquired whether he thought more of the constitution than he did of the public building. It should be said to the everlasting honor of the editor that he held the right of self-government above all other considerations. I undertake to say to-day upon the floor of the Senate that, barring the sacrifice of life and blood, the grand struggle of the people of Arizona to establish a free government upon principles that are the inevitable logic of free government and in the interest of the people, instead of being a contrast with the "embattled farmers" of Lexington, is a splendid supplement upon the field of civic life and civic development in the sacrifice for civic righteousness to the sacrifice and devotion that manifested itself at Concord, Lexington, and Bunker Hill. The Senator was, I fear, unfortunate in citing the example of the "embattled farmers" of Lexington in his argument against the political rights of the "embattled farmers" of Arizona.

The people of Arizona succeeded in their effort, and by a vote of 12,847 for and a vote of 3,822 against, secured their constitution—a vote of almost 4 to 1.

And now the question which confronts the Senate is whether or not the Senate, within the power which it may exercise, shall accord to those people that form of government recognized to be republican within the purview of the Federal Constitution, which they themselves selected in defiance of all the power and threats that were brought to bear and made against them, or whether, arrogating to ourselves the assumption of a superior knowledge, we shall use the mere brute force of votes to deprive them of the right to have the government which they themselves have twice solemnly declared they desire.

The Arizona constitution, with its broad recognition of the right of a people to govern themselves, independent of the dictum of bosses, lobbyists, and special interests, did not meet that general approval in certain circles which the New Mexico constitution met, and as a result a resolution has passed the House providing for again submitting to the people of Arizona one phase of the proposed constitution.

It seems, when we come to analyze this constitution, that what has so disturbed the serenity of the reactionary spirit in and out of the Senate is the fact that the people of Arizona propose in their constitution nothing experimental at all, but propose to simply retain that which originally and naturally is the first fruit—in fact, the very heritage—of free government itself, and that is the right to be a part and parcel of the Government. They, in common with other States, propose to delegate some authority to a legislature, but they also propose, in case the legislature does not pass laws which it ought to pass, that then, not as an experiment but as an original proposition in the exercise of the power which originally is given a free people, the people themselves, with a certain percentage asking for it, and in certain orderly methods prescribed by law, shall reserve the power to legislate for themselves and in the interest of all the people. This is called the initiative.

They also propose that a governor may have the right of veto as is usual, but, inasmuch as this is a delegated power, because primarily the people themselves would have that right, instead of experimenting in reserving the right, they place a limit on the experiment in granting the right of veto by reserving the ultimate right to themselves. That is, if a bad law is rushed through the legislature by sinister influences and the governor will not veto it, the people may do so themselves. This is called the referendum.

They also propose, instead of administering the law without let or hindrance, without delegation of authority, which would be the primary exercise of the right of a free people, to delegate its administration, as is usual, but reserving to themselves the right, inasmuch as they vote for an officer before they know what kind of an officer he will make, to vote against him when they discover what kind of an officer he actually turns out to be, should he prove unsatisfactory. This is what in common parlance to-day is called the recall.

These are called by their opponents "experiments," and we are constantly met by the statement that the initiative, referendum, and recall are experiments, when the fact is just the reverse. The natural fundamental thing is for a people to act for themselves. When they delegate the function to others, such delegation is the experiment. It may be necessary, but none the less experimental.

I want to submit this case to the Senate: Take an individual who has acquired some property. He delegates to an agent the management of that property, but reserves to himself the right to terminate the agency when he finds, in his judgment, the agent is not fulfilling the full measure of the service of that employment. We are now confronted with the proposition, strange as it may seem, that to reserve that right is an experiment. I want to remind the Senate that the bestowal of the authority to the agent is the experiment, and the withdrawal and restoration to the principal is a fundamental principle, natural and not experimental. So in government, the moment you reach the point of free government every single delegation of authority is experimental. The natural logical thing, just so far as a free people can, in view of a wide extent of territory and dense population, would be to do these things themselves; and every delegation of authority is an experiment. The retention by or restoration to the people of the authority is not the experiment. No one holds official position in higher honor than myself, yet we must not lose sight of the fact that after all public officials, from President to postmaster, are simply public servants; the positions created and persons selected not for their benefit but for public service.

For one, I am not very much exercised over the result of this vote. A great many people who believe in progressive policies and progressive principles are somewhat unduly the subject of worry and disappointment if, for any reason, the progress of a movement is temporarily delayed or misdirected. That never worries me for a moment, because I realize that a fundamental principle can no more be permanently stayed than the operation of any other natural law. The forces which make for a policy ultimately in free government are as absolutely resistless as is the law of gravitation.

Reference has been made two or three times during this debate to the relation of Deity to the genesis and history of free government, so I have no apology to offer for making one myself. I want to say that when the Master had completed that short, brief, and marvelous ministry he had set in motion a force that somewhere and sometime in human history was destined to find fruition in free government. Those who opposed free government might attempt to thwart it, those who honestly feared its progress might with calamitous conjuring of overwrought fear rebuke it, or with supercilious contempt they might sneer at its policy, but no human power could prevent its final fruition.

For 18 weary centuries it dragged its length across the pages of human history, sometimes held temporarily in abeyance and sometimes diverted, but ever moving onward, obedient to a resistless law, until finally it found its fruition in a broad sense in the establishment of this Government. I want to say, supplementing that, that obedient to that same great resistless law, the moment that free government became an established fact there was a force supplementing the forces which had developed it from its foundation that was to develop it to its finish. Under that force while men may sneer and men may honestly fear—and I pity above all men the man who honestly fears human progress, because he is doomed to disappointment—by a law as absolutely resistless as that law which through those 18 centuries led to free government, free government is bound to lead to popular government. You may by cunning devices divert the current of human purpose, you may by force and fraud seem for a time to stay its progress, but day by day it moves majestically to its final goal, and its final goal is popular government. The spirit which led man from Calvary to Independence Hall, from Lexington to Yorktown, from Fort Sumter to Appomattox will in the peaceful field of civil development lead him from the point where our fathers left free government, suspended between the twin fears which sat as ominous watchers, to its final analysis, a government by the people in fact as well as in theory.

A great deal has also been said in this discussion about the fathers of the Constitution. I yield to no man in my devotion to the loyalty, the patriotism, and the wisdom of the men who founded this Government; but they were only human. They had no vision beyond the most thoroughly possible developed human vision; nor can we forget that much of their work was accepted by a narrow margin in the constitutional convention and by a narrow margin when it was adopted by the States. They made the Constitution, and the Constitution contains certain declarations of principle; those declarations of principle never have been and never will be repealed, not because of the wisdom of the men who formulated them, but because principle is immortal and immutable.

On the other hand, they placed in that great instrument certain limitations upon the free play of the natural forces of free government, not the guaranties of principles which I have just referred to, but limitations upon the natural direction of the spirit of free institutions. Some of those limitations have already been removed by natural operation; and I believe that every single limitation in the Federal Constitution which is a limitation upon the ultimate exercise of the right of free government by a free people in the manner best adapted to their use will inevitably yield to that law of free government which carries free government in its last analysis to popular government.

I want to illustrate some of these principles. The men who framed the Constitution had just escaped from the tyranny of government, and they were afraid of government. The result was that they sought to minimize government. You find that effort running all through the Constitution and the history of the Constitution. On the other hand, they saw around them the effects of a democracy subject to that turbulent spirit that always succeeds the time when the cohesiveness of a common danger has passed and the cohesiveness of a settled purpose has not yet developed. So, they were afraid of the people; and, while on the one hand they sought to minimize the power of the Government, on the other hand they sought to minimize the power of the people; and thus between these two great fears those men worked and wrought at the foundation of this Government.

Among other things they feared to have the people vote directly for President, and the consequence was they developed the idea of an electoral college. No student of the Constitution on this floor will, I think, dispute me when I say that the primary idea of those men was that the electoral college should be as absolutely independent in the performance of its functions as the voter was in the selection of the members of the electoral college itself; but here they ran counter to the law to which I have referred. You can no more establish an open, outward barrier against the final exercise by the citizen of the right of suffrage than you can turn back the wheels of human progress. The result was that in a few years the American people practically did away with the presidential elector, although they still retain the form.

Without ever changing a line in the Constitution the American people began a process whereby to-day within the States, of course, counting the votes within the States, the American people as absolutely vote directly for President as though there were no presidential electors on the ticket. In my State, and no doubt in other States, they have gone so far as to provide that the voter need not even go through the formality of voting for the elector, but may mark his ballot opposite the name of the presidential candidate, and that carries ipso facto the vote for the electors.

Now, we are told that the casting by the people of a direct vote for President is an experiment. Why, Senators, the delegation of that power was the experiment. The natural thing was for the people to have voted for President as they voted for governor or constable. The delegation, I say again, was the experiment, and, at the risk of tiresome repetition, I am going to emphasize that thought, because running all through this discussion in Congress and outside of Congress is the idea that we are presenting some new things here; that we are asking for changes and experiments, when the fact is we are simply trying to bring something to bear looking to a reduction in the scope of experiments in delegated government, which have been tried and too often found wanting.

By the same token—and here I am going to startle my Bourbon friends, if they take any stock in my prophecy. They may reject the prophecy; I am not a prophet myself nor the son of a prophet, although I was named after a gentleman who had some little local reputation along that line; but I am willing to risk his reputation as a prophet on what I am now going to say—that is, that by the same resistless logic of sequence by which the American people finally came to vote for President they are going to establish a method by which they can directly nominate a President. It is absolutely foreign to our theory of government that any man, I care not how good or how bad he may be, should have the power, through patronage and the tremendous prestige of an administration, either to name his successor or to renominate himself. So, startling as it may be to some of our reactionary friends, five States of this Union have already passed laws where the voter within his party—not experimenting, but withdrawing the experiment, which has proved a direful failure, of delegated power to political bosses and Federal machines and exercising it himself as an original power inherent in free government in the hands of free men—is now in a position to determine for himself who the choice of his party shall be as presidential nominee.

The makers of the Constitution tried another experiment. They did not think that the people generally could be trusted with the election of United States Senators, and so they provided for the delegation of this authority to legislatures; and now, when we propose to restore that power to the people, hands go up in holy horror at the suggestion of "a novel change," of "an experiment." Again, I remind Senators that the natural thing for the people to have done was to have elected Senators as they elect governors. The experiment was in trusting the agent, and withdrawing that trust is not the experiment, but a return to the natural order of things. The experiment was in first granting it to the agent. So, State after State, obedient to the great law which I have described, has formulated a system whereby to-day the American people can exercise their own will and their own choice in the selection of United States Senators.

A good deal has been said during this debate from the standpoint of "holier than thou," on the assumption that a few men know more than everyone else; that the people must be guarded against their own indiscretion. It happened to be my privilege to be the first man who ever on the floor of the Senate advocated the election of United States Senators by the people from the standpoint of the benefit to the Senator himself.

I came into this Chamber 10 years ago, and I began to study the membership of the body. I saw sitting down here a great Senator from the State of Massachusetts, Mr. Hoar. I saw a man who seemed to be absolutely oblivious to the ordinary political methods and the power of political bosses and machines; and knowing that behind every effect there must be cause, I began studying the situation in that State. I found that while Massachusetts had its fair average of political bosses and machine methods, yet in conjunction with the great character of her Senators, like Sumner, Wilson, and Webster, the people of Massachusetts especially, with reference to this Senator, had developed a plan whereby they placed him and his office above the political methods and machine forces of that State. And so, instead of finding that he had lifted himself above his environment, I found his environment had been lifted to a higher altitude.

I then took up the study of a southern Senator, many years my senior, whom I came to love almost as a son loves a father. I refer to the great Senator from Alabama, Mr. Morgan, the man whose mere dictum upon this floor was almost the conclusive declaration of constitutional law. I found that man, in turn, seemed to be absolutely oblivious of all political methods and machine forces usually surrounding a United States Senator. Recognizing again that for every effect there must be a cause, I studied the situation in Alabama, and I found that they not only had developed the primary system, but had carried it so far that when a Senator passed from his seat and the people came to nominate his successor through primary election they nominated two, one to take the office immediately, the other, in case anything happened to him between that time and another primary election, the governor, if it was to be an appointment, the legislature, if an election, would be guided by the will of the people, practically carrying the nomination of a Senator to the second degree.

Then I could understand how that man who so long adorned a seat here could be so independent. He was independent in the sense not that he had lifted himself above an environment, but his environment had been lifted to a higher level. Then it was that it came to me, with a force that it had never come before, that we want the direct election of United States Senators not alone as a right on the part of the people, but as something that would add prestige and dignity to the office and to the strength and independence of the Senator himself.

Now, the delegated elections of President and Senators were not the only experiments which were tried. These men, laboring in the shadow of these two great fears, sought to minimize the power of government.

The first draft of the Federal Constitution contained the word "nation" 23 times. My memory may be at fault, but I think that was the number. In the second draft it had been stricken out 12 times. I am speaking again from memory. And now, without any question as to the correctness of my statement, before it was finally brought for submission to the American people, the word "nation" was stricken out wherever it occurred. The people who framed this Government were afraid of a nation. They had escaped the tyranny of one government, so they sought to hold down the power of the Government which they were creating.

But no great people could ever work out their destiny, no matter what form of federation they had. It requires a nation that a people may reach their highest destiny. And so the American people, notwithstanding the limitations of the written Constitution, proceeded to build a nation. Almost the first act was that of Thomas Jefferson in the acquisition of the Louisiana Purchase; and I want to say here it will always stand as a splendid monument to the patriotism of Thomas Jefferson that he lifted himself above the environment, above the shackles of tradition and the advocacy of the strict construction of the Constitution, and favored an exercise of authority which, with one possible exception, was regarded by all public men to be in excess of constitutional warrant.

It was even proposed that the Constitution might be amended and this purchase ratified, but the American people had started to make a nation of this people, and they did not stop to ratify by amendment to the Constitution.

From there we went on until to-day this Republic is not only engaged in work within our borders far beyond the dream of any man of that age, but also engaged in the construction and operation of railroads and canals in territory beyond the sea.

The next great step in making a nation was the decision of John Marshall. But I want to say that no judicial decision ever made a nation. A nation rises superior to written law, and it can only rise by virtue of an inspiration in the hearts of the people. It can only be cemented by the blood of a people. We have been treated to-day to the picture of a mob here and a mob there. I remember, as a boy, when the great city of New York was throbbing and quivering in the clutch of a mob, showing that within democracy there was evil. But overshadowing that mob in New York there stretched from one ocean to the other two contending hosts, one battling to maintain the Union, the other battling to sever it; one possibly as honest in its convictions as the other, but a host which showed that above all selfish purposes the great bulk—the great rank and file of citizenship—can rise to sacrifice, and in that spirit of sacrifice can alone be found the final sheet anchor of free government.

It is not in judicial decisions. Every mob but one that the Senator from South Dakota referred to to-day was formed in the very shadow of the judicial power which he said would be broken down if the right to recall a judge was given to the people. Every exercise of that mob force that he so eloquently and so vividly depicted this morning was in the very shadow of a condition which he protests against being touched or changed by the unholy hand of this progressive movement, which is based upon the belief that you can no more stop halfway down the hill than you can stop the law of gravitation itself.

When the shattered squadrons of Lee melted away at Appomattox the American people, not by judicial decree but in a sea of blood, amid all the horrors of war, had put the word "nation" back into the Constitution, to remain there as long as this Republic, under the protecting ægis of Deity, shall be the vanguard of human progress.

I simply cite these things to show that it is no reflection upon the wisdom of our ancestors that we have been obliged to go beyond their views upon these questions.

The distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]—and no one will accuse him of being a radical—and the distinguished senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]—and no one will accuse him of being a radical—both to-day admit that this sacred instrument was a mistake so far as the election of United States Senators goes. But the peculiar logic of their attitude is that they tear from this holy shrine that particular trapping they have denounced, but to touch one more thread is unholy desecration—I must suggest it savors of egotism—the putting of the judgment of a few against the fixed purpose of the mighty millions of freemen who make this Government all that it is.

Now, having analyzed those changes, I come to the more direct propositions involved in this joint resolution that has come from the House. It provides that the people of Arizona, who have framed their constitution with an initiative, a referendum, and a recall, may have the recall in case they vote once more upon that question. But my distinguished colleague, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], has offered an amendment providing that they can come in only upon their absolute rejection of the right of recall of judges.

I am loath to differ with my distinguished colleague. He and I have been political companions for a great many years, running back on my part almost to my boyhood. But it so happens that we are alike in one respect—neither one of us has acquired the habit of permitting anybody else to do our thinking, and consequently we sometimes differ. I can not support his amendment. I think the pending resolution is sufficient, even for those who do not themselves believe in the recall.

Now, it is proposed by the pending House resolution that the people of Arizona shall vote again, and whether they reject or retain the right of recall, they may come in; but, that it may be said their action heretofore may have lacked deliberation, they are to vote again. It would seem as though that was enough. First, they braved all the power, political and commercial, of as vicious a plunderbund as ever invaded a Territory in electing the members of their legislature. They braved that same force again in framing their constitution, and now we ask them to once more exercise their deliberate judgment in the face of this tyrannical and overshadowing force.

It does seem to me that when we say to the people of Arizona, "You, perhaps, have acted without consideration; we think you ought once more to act," we have gone to the very limits of the arrogant power which reactionary force ever assumes toward the spirit of human progress. And to say to those people that under no circumstances shall they come into this Union with the recall, is an exercise of arbitrary power that is unwarranted and unjustified. If we were passing a Federal law which would affect the people of our States, and it seemed to us from our knowledge of the views of our constituents that they did not desire the recall, that would be another question. Here we are attempting to say to the people, who as yet have no Representative upon this floor, except the mute eloquence of their own solemn decision, that they not only shall not have what, by an overwhelming majority, after a full canvass, they have decided they desire, but it is proposed that they shall not even pass upon the question. That the price of statehood shall be the absolute surrender of their convictions upon a vital question is not only the unwarranted exercise of brutal power, but it is even worse. It is a covert attempt to bribe the electorate of a prospective State to vote against their convictions in order to have the privilege of American statehood. A fine lesson, indeed, to place before a free people at the threshold of their entrance to an enlarged right of suffrage.

If my State had adopted this measure, and it was possible for this Congress to place a check upon it, I would, if an appeal for fair play fell upon deaf ears, stand here until men less vigorous yielded in the struggle of nature before I would ever surrender the right of Minnesota to legislate for herself; and as those brave people of Arizona have no direct and personal representative upon this floor, I believe it is the duty of the men who believe in free government, who believe in patriotism, in loyalty and devotion to principle, to stand here in defense of the right of the people of Arizona to frame their own form of constitution within the recognized limits of the Federal Constitution; and no one contends seriously that that question is involved; no one who knows the people of Arizona would even suggest its consideration.

Now, let us see what all this frenzy and fury is about; why this conjuring and reproduction of the French Revolution; why this array of mob excitement; why this prophecy, doleful as it is, that we are tearing down the pillars of free government, all because the people of Arizona believe not in an experiment of self-government, but in retaining the right of self-government, and limiting the experiment of delegated authority; and that is all that is involved in the genesis and philosophy of that discussion. Talk about our seeking to tear down the pillars of free government! Popular government is aimed at the political boss, the lobbyist, the special interests masquerading in the form of public service. If these three forces constitute the pillars of free government, God, indeed, is merciful that he veils from our vision the final wreck and ruin of the Republic.

If you could imagine grouping a thousand people at some point where there was no form of law and order, the first thing those people would do would be to prescribe rules, not for the majority—Heaven knows, the struggle of the ages has been the struggle of the majority lacking organization against the tyranny and the viciousness of the few exerting an ever preponderating power through the genius of combination—our laws against murder are not to restrain the majority, for, fortunately, the majority of Americans are not prone to murder, but they are to restrain a small and vicious minority. So that thousand people would gather and prescribe some kind of law and order.

Now, what would be the natural thing? It would be for those people to decide for themselves their rules, and if they undertook to delegate that to a council that delegation would be the experiment; the exercise of the original power would be the natural thing. That is all there is of the initiative—that while we seek to establish a legislature, yet as we are experimenting with the legislature we reduce that experiment to the minimum by reserving the right to pass laws where the legislature refuses to pass the laws which it should. This action is initiated upon petition and proceeds in regular form.

Then what would be the method by which those rules would be rejected? Just take it home as a simple illustration. Those people would naturally reserve the right to repeal the rules which they had established, and so in establishing and advocating the referendum we are not dealing with an experiment, but we are reducing the experiment of a delegated veto power by reserving as much of it as we can to our own hand.

Talk about new-fangled notions; talk about experiments. The experiments have been the delegation, not the retention, of the natural and inherent power.

When it comes to the selection of men to serve those people, the 1,000 primarily and naturally would vote for those agents and they would retain the right to terminate their employment. The moment you delegate the power to elect those agents, the moment you fix, no matter how narrow, the tenure of their office, that moment the experiment comes in. There is no experiment in the people taking back that which they inherently, naturally, and originally had any more than it would be for a man, as I have already said, who had acquired property and found it perhaps wise or expedient to authorize an agent to manage it, to recall to himself his power and to discharge the agent, and it would not be the experiment. The experiment is in trying the agent in the first instance.

While the sole question before us is, "Shall the people of Arizona have the recall if they desire it?" yet it may not be amiss to point out some of the fallacies contained in the arguments against the recall.

As to the recall, some assert they favor it for legislative and administrative officers, but that to apply it to judges would lessen their independence. I maintain that the independence and fearlessness of judges, administrative and legislative officers, each and all, are absolutely indispensable to the permanency of our institutions. If the power of the people to recall an officer would lessen the independence of one, it would of all. To say that the recall is desirable for administrative and legislative officers, but not for judicial officers, because it would lessen their independence is to tacitly concede that there is no crying need of preserving the independence of administrative and legislative officers.

The time was when our courts dealt only with the conflicting claims of individuals and the vindication of the criminal code. Under our complex condition courts to-day make and unmake laws. They even alter the Constitution. They may declare one day that the Constitution is broad enough to cover a statute; the next day that same Constitution is not broad enough to cover the same statute, and the next day once more declare that the same Constitution is broad enough to cover the same statute.

This, while done from the bench, is none the less a political function, and the control of that function by the people should be as open and complete as the control of any political function.

Again, under our complex system, the legislature deals not only with the material welfare of the people, but with their morals and health, subjects as sacred at least as the political questions dealt with by the courts. The opponents of the recall say judges would be apt to render decisions in the shadow of a possible impending appeal to popular favor under the recall. All elective judges to-day have to render decisions under the shadow not of a possible impending appeal to popular favor, but of an actual impending appeal to popular favor when rendered upon the eve of a desired reelection. Yet who would say our judiciary is swayed by that consideration?

The recall is not aimed at the upright judge. He has no more to fear from it, it could no more hold him in terrorem than an approaching reelection. It is not aimed at any faithful officer any more than the criminal code is aimed at that great majority of our people who abhor crime; nor does the history or attitude of our people toward our elective judges justify the claim that they can not be trusted to deal fairly with the judges as regards their reelection. The claim that the recall would intimidate the fearless judge on the one hand or lead to an unreasonable exercise of the suffrage by the people on the other hand is refuted by the fact that our judges fearlessly perform their duty in the face of approaching reelection, and the people retain the faithful judge ofttimes to a point where retention of salary and official power becomes a grateful tribute from the voters for services already rendered the public rather than a return for further services which advancing years lessen the possibility of being rendered.

To my mind, speaking with deference to those who make the argument, it seems little short of an unwarranted reflection on both judges and voters to say, in the light of our everyday experience, that the fearless, upright judge will quail in the face of an appeal to popular favor or that the voters will abuse the use of a recall. But it is said some men are weak. Too true, although fortunately a small proportion. We can not be blind to the fact that in spite of the average high purpose a sinister influence seeks to dominate our political life, securing both the election and appointment of officers, judicial and otherwise, favorably inclined to its interests. The upright, fearless judge does not quail in the face of that force, but the weak man does, and to protect him from that force, to strengthen him when he is weak, the more direct and concrete force of the electorate is developed by the recall counterbalancing that sinister force, which we have found no way as yet to eliminate, although the initiative, referendum, and recall will go far toward not only minimizing but eliminating it as a force which to-day soils the current of our political life.

The argument against vesting this right in the hands of the people is a reflection upon the people themselves. While it is true that here and there a mob may make its appearance, here and there there may be angry passions rising above all restraint, on the other hand there is a sinister purpose that corrupts and invades every channel of this Government into which it can intrude itself, and between those two is the great average of American citizenship which constitutes the composite citizen. It was the composite citizen who, with hardly the shadow of law, fought seven years of a revolution; it was the composite citizen, rising above the limitations of a written Constitution, who solved the problems, physical and political, of the rebellion; when Lincoln declared he had to lock the Constitution in an iron safe to protect it while the Union was being restored and a nation born. It is that same composite citizen who solves every American problem, and it is on his patriotism, wisdom, and integrity that must rest the ultimate power in a free government, upon which must rest the permanency of free government itself.

There is but one power in the last analysis, there is but one balance, and that is the final great rank and file, that equation of American citizenship which has been sneeringly referred to in days gone by upon the floor of the Senate as the composite citizen. Sneer at it as you will, it was the composite citizen who wrought the fulfillment of the prophecy—

> Truth forever on the scaffold, wrong forever on the throne,
> Yet that scaffold sways the future, and beyond the dim unknown
> Standeth God within the shadow, keeping watch above his own.

Those who sneer at the composite citizen forget that, after all, it was that composite force that passed along the cause of human progress in the light of Divine guidance itself.

I want to call attention to another phase of this discussion. Some characterization has been made of the men who are back of the demand for the restoration of popular government. It is not the dynamiter who is the moving power in this restoration of government to the governed. It is the people, who have seen on the floor of the American Senate Senators framing laws to foster unlawful combinations and at the same time forming the unlawful combination itself, which was to profit by the law which they framed. It is the miscarriage of justice. It is the fact that there is a force which must, like a river flow, or else damage will mark its pathway when obstructed or misguided and misdirected. The men who are in favor of this movement, from one ocean to the other, are the rank and file of the people. I submit herewith a summary of States which have legislated upon the subject.

The States in which the initiative and referendum have been adopted as a constitutional amendment are Oregon, Oklahoma, Nevada, Missouri, Montana, South Dakota, Colorado, Arkansas, and Maine. Utah has adopted an initiative and referendum amendment which is inoperative because of failure of the legislature to enact necessary legislation.

The States in which the initiative and referendum amendment has been submitted by the legislatures but has not yet been voted upon by the people are California, Washington, Wyoming, North Dakota, Nebraska, Florida, Idaho, and Wisconsin.

The States that have adopted the Oregon plan of popular election of Senators are Oregon, Nebraska, Nevada, Minnesota, New Jersey, Ohio, Kansas, California, and Wisconsin.

The States that have adopted the Oregon plan of popular vote for candidates for President and Vice President are Oregon, Nebraska, New Jersey, North Dakota, and Wisconsin.

Let us see who is opposed to it, and in this characterization I do not, of course, include all.

As bearing upon the question of the sinister purpose which lies behind this struggle, I want to say, first, that every political boss in this country is opposed to the Arizona constitution. Every lobbyist is opposed to it. Every special interest, that, under the guise of public service, would place itself on the legislative floor and there assume to hold the balance between the people and the interests, is opposed to it. I do not mean by that, of course, that everyone who is opposed to it belongs to any of these classes. I simply mean that the Arizona constitution in its very nature awakens the hostility of those classes.

I hold in my hand an editorial written by Mr. H. C. Miller, editor of the St. Peter (Minn.) Free Press. I want to say of Mr. Miller that, like the country editor to-day, he is a man who is a student of public questions. There has come a wonderful change in our country press in that regard. Our country editors to-day study these questions; they analyze these questions. I myself, of course, feel especially grateful to the country editors of my own State, for had it not been for their loyal support in my first and succeeding elections I would not to-day have the privilege of standing upon this floor. Mr. Miller says:

> In common with other country newspapers, the Free Press received an offer from the Western Newspaper Union of plates containing a speech of Senator SUTHERLAND, of Utah—

Mind you, not the franked speech, which would cost only the price of printing—and which many of us even sometimes strain our financial resources to print that we may send to our friends and the public our utterances—but plates containing a speech of Senator SUTHERLAND, of Utah—> against the initiative and referendum. No doubt many papers will accept the offer because of the saving of money, and many other papers, among them the Free Press, will and did refuse the offer because they prefer to say in their own way what they think of the proposition. It must cost a good deal of money to furnish the plates for that speech free to the newspapers, and evidently some one must be deeply interested in getting the measure—initiative and referendum—defeated.

We often hear it asked, "Why is it that this movement for popular government has developed so recently?" There is a reason for it. Down to the days of the rebellion, the great question that engrossed the American people was largely academic in one sense, although intensely practical, as it finally proved. It was a discussion of great constitutional questions. Following the rebellion, there came that wonderful and marvelous development of our industrial activities that taxed the energies of our people to the utmost. It is only within the last few years that the American people have begun to witness the effect of this development, to witness its invasion of every line and every avenue of public affairs from the city council up, or from somewhere else up to the city council, as different statesmen might see fit to place the order. It is only within the last few years that an occasion for an editorial like that would have existed. Now we find this sinister force seeking to prevent a restoration to the people of the powers of self-government. Well may we recall the warning of the departed Dolliver, who so graphically depicted the hand, grown so bold as to forget its cunning, which seeks to dominate all political action to-day, and realize that the time has come when the American people should take the power back into their hands as a potent instrumentality to offset that influence, and to counterbalance in the equation of independence and integrity, of the official himself.

In closing, I shall only add one word more as a plea for the people of Arizona. I want to remind the Senate once more that we face a condition there that is difficult to describe without trenching upon the delicate subject of discussing on this floor the action of other departments of this Government. I refer to the presence of a Cabinet officer using there the great power of his position against the effort of the people to frame their own constitution. They defied that power. They defied the combined power of the corporations, and they defied the power of that force which sought Arizona as it has sought other Territories, that they might plunder and exploit the affairs of the people. The people themselves deprived of full participation in government were engrossed in their effort to build their homes and establish their habitations. Notwithstanding the people of that Territory defied that power, called their constitutional convention and passed a constitution by a vote of almost 4 to 1, we now ask them to vote once more upon that, that there may be no question of what they really desire.

I do think in doing this we have gone to the extreme limit of a just exercise of legislative power, and I believe it would be abominable, iniquitous, unjust, and violative of the spirit of free government for us, by the mere brutal force of votes and numbers, to say to the people of Arizona, "You shall not have a constitution unless you frame it according to our views and our judgment." It is that spirit of "holier than thou" that has brought so much misery to the children of men; that has so stubbornly, although vainly, sought to obstruct the cause of progress. It is counter to the spirit of free government. Free government rests upon the theory that the great rank and file of the people know what they want, know what they should have, and are entitled to be entrusted with the exercise of that power.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, notwithstanding all attempts to avoid the unpleasant truth, the very proposition that is embodied in the joint resolution now before us, and the very proposition that has been from the first contended for upon the other side, is that the Territory of Arizona shall not have equal rights when she comes into the Union, or after she comes into the Union, with the other States. There is no use in disguising facts behind hairsplitting language. The attitude of Senators on the other side is that this Territory shall not be admitted as a State unless she relinquishes her right, a right which every other State of the Union possesses, to recall her judges if she so desires. You propose to follow the ward beyond the date of majority. You put shackles upon him, not to be worn until the day he arrives at the age of discretion. You intend to compel him to wear those shackles when he has become of full age. All this has been well said by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I take exception, however, to the illustration you have employed. I take exception to treating the 200,000 people of Arizona as you would treat an idiot under guardianship or a minor who has not arrived at the years of discretion.

I say to the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], and I say to the President of the United States, that among the 200,000 people of Arizona there are men who are the equal of any man in this Senate, and if it were not for that reverence we feel for the high office I might even intimate some of them are intellectually and morally the equal of the President of the United States.

To talk about these American citizens who have gone out into that country, who have conquered the wilderness, built cities, maintained law and order, established schools, erected churches, who carried with them education and refinement, and who are capable of fulfilling every duty of the citizen, as though they were children to be guarded by the superior wisdom of the wise men who happen to be in this body, is to insult a brave and a noble people.

I have no quarrel with the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], who takes the view that this constitution does not establish a republican form of government. I do not agree with his premise, but it affords him logical ground to occupy in his opposition to the reception of this Territory as a State. But when it is admitted, as it is admitted by others here in this Chamber, that this is a republican form of government, then the sole question remaining is, Shall the power of the President of the United States, in the teeth of the declaration of Congress that the State shall be admitted if it adopt a constitution republican in form, be arbitrarily exercised to deny this people admission into the sisterhood of States. I say that whenever a power is arbitrarily exercised it reflects but little credit on the man who employs it.

I have read the remarkable veto message. It amounts to this, and no more, namely, Arizona shall be refused admission because its constitution is not such as I would have written. If this doctrine is to be followed, then no State will hereafter be admitted unless it shall adopt a constitution which is satisfactory, not to its people, who are to live under it, but to the gentleman who happens to sit in the office of President, and who does not live under it. Thus we substitute the will of the President for the will of the people of a State. His decree takes the place of law. The people of Arizona were, by Congress, given the privilege of adopting a constitution for their government. We are now adding a codicil to that law. It reads this way:

> Provided, however, That they shall adopt a constitution which, in the opinion of the President of the United States, is a wise instrument.

The President concedes in his message that Arizona's constitution does in fact establish a republican form of government. Having admitted that he has conceded the entire case. No man can deny that. If we abandon the ground that the only proper reason which can be assigned for ever denying a Territory admission is that it has not adopted a republican form of government, we enter a new and dangerous field. We abandon the present constitutional requirement. We, in effect, place a new clause to the Constitution, a new condition in our laws, namely, that a Territory shall adopt a constitution satisfactory to the man who happens then to occupy the position of Chief Executive. When you take that step you pass from a position where rights are based upon a rule of law to one where the right becomes a mere privilege, dependent upon the caprice of an individual. That, sir, is a most dangerous step to take.

Suppose, sir, we were to have a President two years from now—and I will say to you we are going to have a new one—suppose this new President believes very earnestly in the recall of judges and really thinks that no State should be admitted to the Union unless it adopt the initiative, the referendum, and the recall. Suppose, further, that another Territory were to ask for admission, or this Territory, then being still out of the Union, were to ask admission upon a constitution written according to the views of the present Chief Executive, and the new Democratic Chief Executive or the progressive Republican Chief Executive or what ever he may be should say, "I refuse to admit you to statehood because you failed to put the initiative, the referendum, and the recall into your constitution." Instead of the constitutional limitation we have now we would then have the arbitrary, dictatorial, unjustifiable government of man's opinion. We substitute for the Constitution the mandate of one individual. We place over and above the Constitution the dictum of one man who happens to be President of the United States. I am surprised that the present Chief Executive, who claims to so love the law, who claims to so love the Constitution, who claims to so desire to preserve the bulwarks of our liberty, should be the first to substitute his individual opinion, individual judgment, individual liking for the solemn language of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, I am afraid there are some things in this fight that lie outside of the Constitution, that lie outside of the arguments which have been produced here against this measure. These Territories have been asking admission for many, many years. This Territory was solemnly guaranteed its admission many, many years ago; and they have been discussing for years in those Territories the terms of their constitutions. The initiative is not new in the language of Arizona or New Mexico. The referendum was not thought of merely on the day they adopted this constitution; it had been discussed there for years.

The recall was an old story when the events to which I am about to call your attention took place. There was once a President of the United States; he was then appealing to these people "who can not be trusted to govern themselves"; he was asking for their support then, and I suppose, of course, in this instance looking only for "the sober judgment of the people" that we hear so much about in this Chamber. That man went down into the domain that is embraced by these two Territories, and while down there made a speech. I want to read you some telegraphic copies of affidavits which were made in relation to that speech:

ALBUQUERQUE, N. MEX., August 10, 1911.

TERRITORY OF NEW MEXICO, County of Bernalillo:

D. A. MacPherson, of lawful age, being first duly sworn, deposes and says that he is the publisher of the Albuquerque Morning Journal, and was such publisher on the 15th and 16th of October, 1909; that on the 15th day of October, 1909, he received from the staff correspondent of said publication a report of the remarks of President Taft, delivered at Gallup, N. Mex., on said 15th day of October, 1909, in part in words as follows:

"Now, my friends, I might just as well make the announcement now, so as to relieve any doubt on the subject, that I was elected on a platform that declared in favor of the admission of New Mexico and Arizona as separate States, and that so far as I can properly exercise any influence as Chief Executive—for bear in mind that I am now the legislature—I expect to exercise that influence to carry out the promises of the platform upon which I was elected."

That said above-quoted excerpts from the said remarks of President Taft were published in the language above quoted in the issue of the Albuquerque Morning Journal on October 16, 1909; and further deponent saith not.

Mr. President, I think I have a little light to throw upon the President's change of position. These statements were made in 1909. The Territories, of course, were and still are infested by Federal officeholders; infested by Federal postmasters appointed by Federal officials. The President at that time, in my opinion, believed that he could control the situation and force his opinions then upon the people of those Territories. In support of this statement I read the following telegram:

PHOENIX, ARIZ., August 12, 1911.

E. B. O'NEILL,
208 Ninth Street SE., Washington, D. C.:

It is a well-known fact that Hitchcock, during the campaign for the election of delegates to our constitutional convention, traveled over Arizona with different Federal officials holding quiet little receptions at which plans were made for the defeat of the candidates who stood pledged for a progressive constitution. Taft's name was freely used and insinuations made concerning projected Federal buildings. His friends told the Arizona Gazette to be good or Republican patronage would cease. The Gazette refused to be coerced, and patronage did cease; practically every postmaster in Arizona immediately became active in fighting the progressive candidates. It is well known his visit influenced papers in Tucson, Yuma, Globe, and Prescott.

C. H. AKERS, Acting Chairman.
J. L. IRVIN, Secretary.

Mr. President, the objection to the constitution of Arizona is not the judicial recall. The objection—the real objection—lies in the fact that the President, through his satellites and officeholders, was unable to dictate to the people of Arizona. So, having failed to dictate, we find him now arbitrarily using the power that is vested in him to deny 200,000 people admission into this Union.

The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] says that we should not admit these people if they have this clause in their constitution. I take it, sir, that the people of Arizona have been treated to a judiciary, appointed by the President, that has caused them to take a rather extreme view of judges. In my humble opinion the people of Arizona desire the judicial recall because so many Federal judges so exercised their powers that the people often prayed God to exercise the right of Divine recall. ,

I have lived—we all have lived in our various States and know how much the people reverence the law and how they will stand and uphold the hands of the judges of our courts. Right or wrong, whether they agree or disagree with their decisions, the people uphold the judges wherever they are. There are only a few spots in this land that I know of where the people distrust the judiciary, and that is where Federal judges, appointed by the President, have been put over the people. It is the judicial wrongs perpetrated in the Territories which have caused the people to distrust that particular variety of judge. It happened in Oklahoma, as my friend here representing Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] knows; it happened in North Dakota, as was charged here the other day by the Senator from North Dakota; it has happened in every Territory that Territorial judges—not all of them, but too many of them—have been regarded by the people with distrust. Justly have many of these judges been distrusted.

Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], who stands here and says that he represents a State with 9,000,000 people, and who, therefore, assumes the right to dictate to the free people of the Territory of Arizona, that I believe they will average as high in intelligence as the citizens of the great Empire State. I assert that, with the judicial recall or without it, under any form of government they may ever set up, they will give this country as good a government as Tammany gives New York City; and that if we are to judge, not according to the Constitution, if we are to admit Territories into the Union, not according to the precepts of the Constitution, but according to the judgment and opinion of one man, then I trust that man will not be a representative of that organization to which I have just referred.

Mr. President, one thought about this message. Here is a case of special pleading that I think is unequaled. It does not amount even to a good plea of avoidance. The President recognizes the fact, as he must recognize the fact, that the only constitutional ground upon which these people can be denied admission is that they have not adopted a republican form of government. Having recognized that fact, the President seeks to escape responsibility for denying them admission, and sustains his position by a species of sophistry—if I may say that it rises to the dignity of sophistry—such as never before appeared in an American state paper.

Mark you, Congress had passed a bill and the President had signed a bill providing for the admission of these Territories when they adopted a constitution republican in form. Under the circumstances, when the constitutions were presented, there was nothing necessary to be done by Congress or necessary to be done by the President, except simply to ascertain that the constitutions were republican, to approve or disapprove. The President concedes in this message that if the matter had come to him in that particular form he ought to have gone no further than to ascertain that the constitutions were, within the meaning of the law, republican constitutions. But when the statehood measures came here we did something to them. What was it? We added a provision that a section of the Arizona constitution and a section of the New Mexico constitution should be again voted upon. That made it necessary for the President to sign the bill, but did it change the moral position because we had simply placed an additional requirement upon these States, and that requirement was in the nature of an obstruction to the very thing the President condemns? Manifestly, then, if it was the duty of the President to have approved these constitutions because they were republican in form, before we added that amendment, it was his duty afterwards to have done the same thing, and yet here is the excuse he offers for refusing to approve. It is so pitiable that I hesitate to read it into the RECORD, and would not do so if it were not already a matter that had gone into a public document. I read:

> It may be argued from the text of that act—
> That is, the act providing for admission—
> it may be argued from the text of that act that in giving or withholding the approval under the act my only duty is to examine the proposed constitution, and if I find nothing in it inconsistent with the Federal Constitution, the principles of the Declaration of Independence, or the enabling act, to register my approval. But now I am discharging my constitutional function in respect to the enactment of laws, and my discretion is equal to that of the Houses of Congress.

In what way was his discretion enlarged because we amended this act? How did that change his responsibility? How did that affect the issue in this case? We had provided that if they came in with a constitution that was republican in form, they should be admitted when that constitution had been approved as to its form; but because it went to the President afterwards in the form of a bill from Congress, he seized upon that circumstance to inject into the question for the first time his personal opinions and views.

Mr. President, I solemnly protest to the Senate of the United States and the country against substituting for the language of the Constitution, which provides that States shall be received when they have adopted a republican form of government, a proposition to the effect that States shall only be received when their constitution meets with the approval of the man who happens to be Chief Executive. When you do that you do a dangerous thing.

Mr. President, we are called on here to act, and I want to present the reasons for my vote. I think the veto message of the President ought to be here, the roll ought to be called, and every Senator required to register his vote. I should like to see how many Senators' opinions have been changed overnight, and I should like to know how far the patronage of the White House can affect the consciences of men. But I believe the message will not be here, and as reluctantly as I do it, I nevertheless shall support the proposition of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, in the closing hours of this debate I have no desire to prolong the discussion. I fully indorse every statement made on the floor of this Chamber yesterday and to-day in condemnation of the provision in the Arizona constitution in relation to the recall of judges, and I desire to enter my solemn protest against what I conceive to be the most destructive and the most revolutionary assault ever made upon the stability of our Government.

In the wisdom of our fathers the functions of government were distributed among three departments, each absolutely independent of the other. This plan proposed in the Arizona constitution is well calculated to degrade and to subordinate the judiciary to the other two departments of the Government.

We have grown and prospered under the system of government devised by the fathers as no other nation in the history of the world, and experience has demonstrated that ours is the best form of representative government ever conceived by the brain of man. Are we ready to destroy this edifice? Are we prepared to give our approval to a principle which, if generally applied, would undermine our institutions?

If the recall of judges is a wise measure for the proposed State of Arizona, why should it not be adopted in every other State of the Union? Why should it not be applied to the Federal judiciary? How long would this Republic survive the general introduction of this pernicious principle? An untrammeled judiciary is the bulwark of our liberties, and if you dethrone it you substitute tumult, lawlessness, and anarchy and hasten the dissolution of the Republic.

I assert that this Government can not endure without a stable judiciary system in the Nation as well as in the State, and if you countenance or approve this provision of the Arizona constitution you strike a blow against the entire judiciary of the United States.

My vote shall be recorded against this joint resolution as it comes from the House. I shall not yield my judgment and my devotion to the basic principles of representative government to the demand of 12,000 citizens of Arizona or of any other section of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question, first, is on agreeing to the amendments to the original joint resolution. There are a few committee amendments which must first be acted upon. The Secretary will report the first amendment.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I desire first to call the attention of the Senate to a few telegrams I have from Arizona, which are only a few among many, setting forth the desire and wishes of the people of Arizona:

PHOENIX, ARIZ., August 8.

Hon. R. L. OWEN, Washington, D. C.:

We are standing firm for Flood resolution; telegrams to contrary do not represent vote of people on constitution; show to O'Neill.

United States Senator OWEN,
Washington, D. C.:

Beware of the eleventh-hour telegrams. There has been no meeting of the Douglas Chamber of Commerce. Tools of the "interests" are known to be active against the Flood resolution in the hope of defeating statehood or rendering abortive the expressed will of the people.

H. C. BAUMLER,
Secretary Mass Meeting.

Mr. President, I have listened with great interest and respect to the views of my distinguished colleagues in discussing this question, and I wish briefly to outline the different points of view in regard to these two Territories. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has just called the attention of the Senate to the extreme difficulty of amending the constitution of the State of New Mexico. In the first place, one-third of the members of the lower house of the Legislature of New Mexico may prevent proposals to amend. One-third of the senate of the Legislature of New Mexico may prevent proposals to amend, except that after the expiration of two years and at the regular session of each eighth year thereafter a majority of both houses, approved by the governor, may propose an amendment. But after the amendment has been proposed the same must be—ratified by a majority of the electors voting thereon and by an affirmative vote equal to at least 40 per cent of all the votes cast at said election in the State and by 40 per cent of all the votes cast in at least one-half of the counties thereof.

I am opposed to tying the hands of the majority and giving the minority a variety of vetoes over the majority, as the constitution of New Mexico proposes.

This feature objected to by me is regarded as a great virtue by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who believes in making it difficult to amend the constitution and thinks the minority should have a veto over the majority.

I believe in the people's rule. He opposes the people's rule for fear the people may be swept away by passion and uncontrollable impulse. I favor majority rule. He opposes majority rule and favors minority veto.

While the Senator from Missouri was speaking I called his attention to the adoption of the constitution of Texas. This constitution was framed by a convention which met at Austin July 4, 1845, and concluded its labors August 27, 1845. It was submitted to the people and ratified October 13, 1845, by 4,174 votes against 312 votes. Texas at that time, as shown by the first census after Texas came in, had 154,000 whites, or about 30,000 votes. On the frontier the voters were probably more numerous than in average communities, because there would probably be more than one voter out of five persons, which is the usual rule. But if there were 30,000 votes for a governor at that time, probably the vote cast for an amendment would be very greatly less. It would not be surprising if the vote for questions of policy would only be 50 or 60 per cent of the greater vote cast for the governor and State officials. Out of the 30,000 votes in Texas that might have been cast for governor only 4,174 votes were cast for the constitution of Texas, or about 14 per cent.

This New Mexico 40 per cent rule for State and half of the counties are two artificial obstructions, intended to prevent the people of New Mexico from amending their own constitution, and this contest over New Mexico and Arizona is but the example on a small field of a great contest that is going on throughout the United States. It is the world-wide contest between the rule of the organized minority and the unorganized majority. I believe in the rule of the majority under reasonable constitutional safeguards and restraints, and I do not believe in the rule of the organized minority through constitutional vetoes, through machine methods, through craft, through bribery, through coercion, which are the weapons commonly used by the minority for the coercion and control of the unorganized majority.

I believe in the initiative and the referendum because it arms the majority not among themselves but against those who are trusted with temporary power. We have heard much in this debate about the people protecting themselves against themselves by the restraints and safeguards of constitutional law.

I say, Mr. President, that the people in drawing their constitutions have fixed the powers which they delegate to their chosen citizens for its proper exercise; they have done so not to protect themselves against themselves, but to protect themselves against their own officials. They have drawn constitutions so as to restrain, not themselves, but to restrain the officials who are trusted by the people with their governing business.

It is a tory fallacy to charge the people with intending to deny to themselves the governing power.

The fallacy is flatly and overwhelmingly denied and contradicted in every one of the 46 bills of rights and in the Declaration of Independence, declaring all the powers of governing to be in the hands of the people—irrevocable and indefeasible.

Where else should it be in a republic of self-governing men?

The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] lays down the proposal that a vote to admit Arizona and New Mexico commits every Senator to the principles laid down in those constitutions; that when we vote to admit Arizona with the recall of judges we commit ourselves to the approval of the recall of judges. I entertain a very different view. I do not approve the constitution of New Mexico. I do not approve the provision making it impossible to impose an intelligence qualification on the electorate of that proposed State. But in yielding to them the right of self-government I yield it because I think any State has the right of self-government, and to deny it is to deny to them a constitutional right which is fundamental and which on my oath I can not justly deny.

I am strongly opposed to the constitution of New Mexico in favoring the corporations at the expense of the people and in being unamendable, but I am not committed to these principles of government because I concede the right of New Mexico to enter the Union with a constitution I disapprove in these respects. I favor allowing New Mexico to govern itself, whether her constitution meets my approval or not, so long as it does not violate the Constitution of the United States.

The Senator from New York lays down the proposal that while he believes in the people, after mature thought he does not believe in the exercise of the right of mere majority rule by the people, and he calls attention to the constitutional law in which the majority has bound itself against excess. In reality the people are vested with all authority in the governing business and could not, if they would, divest themselves of this indefeasible right under our system of government. This doctrine is the very essence of the Declaration of Independence, which declares that all government must rest upon the consent of the governed. That is the doctrine laid down by the bill of rights in every one of our 46 States. The bill of rights of the State of New York declares that—in the name and by the authority of the good people of this State, doth ordain, determine, and declare that no authority shall, on any pretense whatever, be exercised over the people or members of this State but such as shall be derived from and granted by them.

I remind the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] that the bill of rights of South Dakota declares:

All men are born equally free and independent and have certain inherent rights, among which are those of enjoying and defending life and liberty, of acquiring and protecting property, and a pursuit of happiness. To secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.

And so, in all 46 States the same doctrine is repeated and reiterated over and over again in a great variety of forms.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. A few days ago the Senator from Oklahoma printed a statement in the RECORD showing the constitutional provisions of various States bearing upon the removal of judges, and through an error, of course, and without any intent to mislead, the Senator did not correctly quote the constitution of Michigan upon that subject.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from Michigan means to say that the quotation was not completed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It was not completed.

Mr. OWEN. It was not completed. The purpose of the quotation was merely to show the right in the legislature to recall, but not to show the reasons assigned for removal, which explains why the quotation was not more fully made.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It practically becomes important that the judge who is charged shall have a right to know the reasons and answer. The language of the constitution, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. OWEN. Yes; I shall be glad to have the Senator put it in.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The constitution of Michigan, article 9, section 6, says:

For reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground for impeachment, the governor shall remove any judge on a concurrent resolution of two-thirds of the members elected to each house of the legislature; and the cause for which such removal is required shall be stated at length in such resolution.

I, of course, know that the quotation was intended to be correct, and I simply rise for the purpose of placing in the RECORD a correct quotation of the constitution of Michigan upon this subject.

Mr. OWEN. I am pleased to have it in the RECORD.

The difference in the point of view between the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and myself is that I believe the people who elect the judges in Arizona should have the right to recall them as proposed in the Arizona constitution, and the Senator from Minnesota thinks they may do so after they are admitted, but should not be allowed to do so at the time of admission, but as a condition of admission should be compelled to vote this power out of the constitution, though they could vote it back into the constitution the following month.

Mr. President, I think it is well in considering the recall of judges to remind the Senate that in the early days of government the judge was a branch of the executive. Originally the king held court, and at a later day the king's bench was established. These powers were gradually transferred from the king to the bench as an arm of the executive to determine what justice was, what right was, and there was a vast volume of unwritten law due to the practices of the people, the so-called common law. The judges determined what was right, what was just between men, what was the common and the equity law and then the statute law. It was a necessary agency of the Executive for the ascertainment of what justice was and what the law was.

When we established in this country our Government and established the three branches, each of which was measurably independent of the other, but not absolutely independent, and could not be absolutely independent, they were spoken of as coordinate branches, as if one was as important as the other.

I take issue with any such principle. They are not equally important. Thirty-two legislatures can recall judges, but no court can recall a legislature. The great power in this country is vested in the sovereign people. The people of this country then delegate that power, first of all, to a law-making branch, who shall declare what the law is, what the law shall be, and who shall make the law, and who shall amend the law, as the advancing progress justifies.

First by the Constitutional Convention the people delegate the power to lay down the organic law. Then they delegate under the Constitution the power to the legislature. Then the statute law follows.

The legislature by statute defines the executive department with the duty of carrying out the law as framed by the legislative branch; and because the executive may not know the real meaning of the law another branch is established—the judiciary—whose function it is to declare what the law is, the meaning of the common and equity and maritime law and of the legislative will.

I believe in the independence of the judiciary. I would not be willing to support any system that I thought would impair the judiciary's independence; but I insist upon it that men are mortal, and if men get places upon the Federal bench or upon the State bench, and do not exercise their duty properly, they ought to be subject to the sovereign will of the people. The will of the people will not be exercised as by a raging, furious, turbulent mob, described on the floor of the Senate as characteristic of the action of the American people. It will be exercised, if at all, in the quiet seclusion and safety of the booth—in the ballot box. Each man will quietly deposit his opinion, and if it is possible to imagine a place far removed from mob violence, from turbulence, it is in the quiet and protected cloisters which the law lays around the ballot under the Australian system. I myself wish to have it appear upon the record that I regard the judiciary of America as occupying a very distinguished place. I have a very profound respect for the American judiciary, but I do not regard these functionaries as infallible, and I would be untrue to my own opinion if I failed to say what I think with regard to the judiciary. I want to let the distinguished Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, appear in this record when he criticized the Supreme Court of the United States, on September 7, 1854, before the Republican State convention at Worcester, Mass.:

Mr. Sumner's reception in the convention was quickened by recent events in which he had borne part. It is thus described in a report of the convention:

"At this point the Hon. Charles Sumner entered the hall. His reception was such as is rarely accorded to a public man. The whole vast audience rose as one man to welcome him, and the most deafening cheers of welcome resounded for several minutes. We have never seen a more hearty and enthusiastic demonstration in honor of any man. It was the spontaneous homage of true men to the man who had upheld the freedom standard and carried it into the thickest of the fight—to the man who had upheld the honor of Massachusetts in the Senate, vindicated her opinions, and thrown back upon her assailants the taunts and insults which they had never ceased to heap upon her. The cheering as our Senator appeared upon the platform and took his seat was loud and long continued."

Here is what he said about the Supreme Court in commenting on the Dred Scott decision:

For myself, let me say that I hold judges, and especially the Supreme Court, in much respect; but I am too familiar with the history of judicial proceedings to regard them with any superstitious reverence. [Sensation.] Judges are but men, and in all ages have shown a full share of human frailty. Alas! alas! the worst crimes of history have been perpetrated under their sanction. The blood of martyrs and of patriots, crying from the ground, summons them to judgment. It was a judicial tribunal which condemned Socrates to drink the fatal hemlock and which pushed the Savior barefoot over the pavements of Jerusalem, bending beneath His cross. It was a judicial tribunal which, against the testimony and entreaties of her father, surrendered the fair Virginia as a slave; which arrested the teachings of the great Apostle to the Gentiles and sent him in bonds from Judea to Rome; which, in the name of the old religion, persecuted the saints and fathers of the Christian Church and adjudged them to a martyr's death in all its most dreadful forms; and afterwards, in the name of the new religion, enforced the tortures of the inquisition, amidst the shrieks and agonies of its victims, while it compelled Galileo to declare, in solemn denial of the great truth he had disclosed, that the earth did not move round the sun. It was a judicial tribunal which, in France, during the long reign of her monarchs, lent itself to be the instrument of very tyranny, as during the brief reign of terror it did not hesitate to stand forth the unpitying accessory of the unpitying guillotine. Ay, sir, it was a judicial tribunal in England, surrounded by all forms of law, which sanctioned every despotic caprice of the Henry VIII from the unjust divorce of his queen to the beheading of Sir Thomas More; which lighted the fires of persecution that glowed at Oxford and Smithfield over the cinders of Latimer, Ridley, and John Rogers; which, after elaborate argument, upheld the fatal tyranny of ship money against the patriot resistance of Hampden; which, in defiance of justice and humanity, sent Sidney and Russell to the block; which persistently enforced the laws of conformity that our puritan fathers persistently refused to obey; and afterwards, with Jeffreys on the bench, crimsoned the pages of English history with massacre and murder, even with the blood of innocent women. Ay, sir, it was a judicial tribunal in our own country, surrounded by all forms of law, which hung witches at Salem; which affirmed the constitutionality of the stamp act, while it admonished "jurors and people" to obey; and which now, in our day, lends its sanction to the unutterable atrocity of the fugitive-slave act.

Mr. Sumner, as late United States Senator from Massachusetts, may answer the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] on the question of the infallibility and impeccability of courts.

I have heretofore said all that I care to say upon the recall of judges, and upon what I have said I firmly stand. There has been nothing said in this debate that justifies in any degree a change of my opinion with regard to it. I believe in the fundamental doctrine that the people of this country are sovereign; that they will exercise the right of sovereignty with discretion, with moderation, with long forbearance, with great patience, and that they never will at the ballot box indulge in any act that can be characterized as the act of an "unrestrained mob," which is the chief argument, apparently, against the recall of judges.

Our critics say if the people can recall judges the judges will yield the judicial judgment to popular opinion. If this be a true criticism, then such judges will yield the judicial judgment to the boss who nominates, may renominate, and may promote. Public opinion is a better and safer influence for judges who may be influenced on the bench than the influence of a political boss or his commercial allies.

Mr. President, on July 11 the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] fiercely denounced the initiative and the referendum of the Arizona constitution as "wild and visionary," "utterly vicious and impracticable," and so forth.

At the same time the Senator from Utah criticized the composite citizenship of Oklahoma, the constitution of Oklahoma, and the Senator from Oklahoma. He denounced those who believe in these doctrines as "quacks in politics," as "self-constituted reformers," as "self-constituted guardians of the people's rights," as "visionaries," "dreamers," "agitators," "demagogues," "political zealots," "false pilots or arrant knaves," and so forth.

In answer to these epithets, apparently addressed to those who, like myself, believe in these doctrines, I make no response, except to say that abuse is often "the refuge of defeated argument."

The arguments in favor of the initiative and referendum I presented on the floor of the Senate in discussing the admission of Arizona on March 4, 1911, and I shall not repeat them here. The Senators from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and the Senator from California have exhausted the argument in its support, and I do not care to consume the time of the Senate with repeating it.

The astonishing thing about the diatribe of the Senator from Utah is that he is denouncing the principles of the constitution of Utah, which provides for the initiative, the referendum, and the recall.

The constitution of Utah provides as follows:

ART. 6, SEC. 1. The legislative power of the State shall be vested:

1. In a senate and house of representatives, which shall be designated the Legislature of the State of Utah.

2. In the people of the State of Utah, as hereinafter stated:

The legal voters, or such fractional part thereof of the State of Utah as may be provided by law, under such conditions and in such manner and within such time as may be provided by law, may initiate [initiative] any desired legislation and cause the same to be submitted to a vote of the people for approval or rejection, or may require any law passed by the legislature (except those laws passed by two-thirds vote of the members elected to each house of the legislature) to be submitted to the voters of the State before such law shall take effect. [Referendum.]

The legal voters, or such fractional part thereof as may be provided by law, of any legal subdivision of the State, under such conditions and in such manner and within such time as may be provided by law, may initiate any desired legislation and cause the same to be submitted to a vote of the people of said legal subdivision for approval or rejection, or may require any law or ordinance passed by the law-making body of said legal subdivision to be submitted to the voters thereof before such law or ordinance shall take effect. (As amended Nov. 6, 1900.)

ART. 8, SEC. 11: Judges may be removed from office by the concurrent vote of both houses of the legislature, each voting separately; but two-thirds of the members to which each house may be entitled must concur in such vote. The vote shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the members voting for or against a judge, together with the cause or causes of removal, shall be entered on the journal of each house. The judge against whom the house may be about to proceed shall receive notice thereof, accompanied with a copy of the cause alleged for his removal, at least 10 days before the day on which either house of the legislature shall act thereon.

Mr. President, here we find in the constitution of Utah the initiative, the referendum, and the recall, and we find the honorable Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], holding the honors and dignities of the people of that State, denouncing the principles laid down in the constitution of his own State.

Nothing could induce me to do such a thing, but I do not attempt to reproach the Senator from Utah for his conduct in the matter for the reason that I can not believe that he realized the impropriety of such an act or that he is aware of the bias of his own mind which leads him to such conduct.

I believe that the point of view of the Senator from Utah can only be explained by the fact that he gives voice to the peculiar forces outside of the constitution of Utah which hold the organic law of Utah in contempt and which have defeated "the permanent will of the people" of that State as expressed in their organic law for the last 10 years.

The Senator from Utah quotes Prof. Stimson as admirably stating:

> The constitution is the permanent will of the people; the law is but the temporary act of their representatives, who have only such power as the people choose to give them.

The Senator from Utah used this language, but it is obvious that he has entirely forgotten what "the permanent will of the people" of Utah happens to be on this vital issue of self-government—the initiative, the referendum, and the recall.

For five successive legislatures in Utah the so-called "representatives of the people" have refused to enact the statute law needed to vitalize the provisions of the Utah constitution and make effective the initiative and the referendum. What kind of "representative" government is this that we have in Utah, where "the permanent will of the people" is thus ignored by their so-called "representatives" in the legislature, and where the Senator from Utah, representing that great State and holding its honors and its dignities, ridicules and derides and holds up to public scorn the constitutional provisions of his own State?

We must inquire into this peculiar and extraordinary situation. My just observation that the Constitution of the United States as framed was not sufficiently democratic induces the Senator from Utah to ridicule the manners of the Senator from Oklahoma and to suggest that he should be prosecuted for omniscience for making this ludicrous discovery.

In view of the distinction of the critic and the public charge that the Senator from Utah was a recent candidate for the Supreme Bench of the United States, it becomes necessary to justify the observation made by the Senator from Oklahoma that the Constitution as framed was not democratic. I shall do this with great brevity.

First. The Constitution permitted a life President.

Second. The Constitution did not provide for the nomination or election of the President by the people, but by electors far removed from the people.

Third. The Constitution did not provide for the nomination or election of Senators by the people.

Fourth. The Constitution provided for an uncontrolled judiciary, in striking contrast to the laws of every State in the Union, including Utah.

Fifth. A minority of the House can prevent the majority proposing an amendment to the Constitution. A minority of the Senate can prevent the majority proposing an amendment to the Constitution. A President can prevent a majority of both Houses proposing an amendment to the Constitution. A small minority of the States can prevent the amendment of the Constitution.

Sixth. No provision for the adoption of the Constitution was arranged by popular vote.

And some of the delegates who approved the Constitution from Virginia at least disobeyed the instructions of the people.

Seventh. The Constitutional Convention usurped the power in framing the Constitution.

They were only authorized to prepare amendments to the Articles of Confederation, not frame a new Constitution.

Eighth. The Constitution did not protect the right of free speech.

Ninth. The Constitution did not protect the right of free religion.

Tenth. It did not protect the freedom of the press.

Eleventh. It did not protect the right of the people to peaceably assemble.

Twelfth. It did not protect the right of the people to petition the Government for the righting of grievances.

Thirteenth. It did not protect the right of the States to have troops.

Fourteenth. It did not protect the right of the people to keep and bear arms.

Fifteenth. It did not protect the people against the quartering of soldiers upon them without their consent.

Sixteenth. It did not protect the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures nor against warrants, except upon suitable safeguards.

Seventeenth. It did not protect the people against being held for crime, except on indictment.

Eighteenth. It did not protect the people against a second trial for the same offense.

Nineteenth. It did not protect an accused against being compelled to be a witness against himself.

Twentieth. It did not protect the citizen against being deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.

Twenty-first. It did not protect private property being taken for public use without just compensation.

Twenty-second. It did not secure, in criminal prosecutions, the right of a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury in the place where the crime was committed.

Twenty-third. It did not protect the accused in the right to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, of the right to be confronted with the witnesses against him, of the right to have compulsory processes in obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel in his defense.

Twenty-fourth. It did not protect the right of the citizen in common lawsuits to a trial by jury.

Twenty-fifth. It did not protect the citizen against excessive bail, against excessive fines, nor against cruel and unusual punishments.

Twenty-sixth. It did not safeguard the rights reserved by the people against invasion by the Federal Government.

The Constitutional Convention was a secret conclave, no member being allowed to report or copy any of its proceedings, which were kept a profound secret for 50 years, until all the actors were dead. The membership of the Constitutional Convention was notoriously conservative, consisting of such men as Elbridge Gerry, who declared "that democracy was the worst of all political evils." (Elliot's Debates, vol. 5, p. 557.)

Edmund Randolph observed that, in tracing the political evils of this country to their origin, "every man (in the convention) had found it in the turbulence and follies of democracy."

Madison thought the Constitution "ought to secure the permanent interests of the country against innovation." (Elliot's Debates, vol. 1, p. 450.)

Hamilton urged a permanent Senate "to check the imprudence of democracy."

Gouverneur Morris urged a life Senate, saying "such an aristocratic body will keep down the turbulence of democracy."

Madison, in the Federalist, warned the people against "the superior force of an interested and overbearing majority," and so forth.

Twenty-seventh. The Constitution is undemocratic in making no provision for its adoption or subsequent amendment by direct popular vote, although this was the method of the various States.

The Constitution is undemocratic, as I have shown, in omitting a bill of rights and the great fundamental principles contained in the Declaration of Independence.

James Allen Smith, professor of political science, University of Washington, well says:

> From all evidence that we have the conclusion is irresistible that they sought to establish a form of government which would effectually curb and restrain democracy. They engrafted upon the Constitution so much of the features of popular government as was, in their opinion, sufficient to insure its adoption.

The convention of July 4, 1776, was thoroughly democratic, as is the Declaration of Independence.

The Constitution of the United States was made thoroughly undemocratic by a thoroughly reactionary convention, leading Democrats being absent, such as Thomas Jefferson, Samuel Adams, Patrick Henry, and so forth. Only 11 States voted for its adoption. Only 55 members out of 65 attended and only 39 members signed it. Its ratification was only secured with the greatest difficulty, and in no States was it submitted to a vote of the people themselves. Massachusetts, South Carolina, New Hampshire, Virginia, and New York demanded amendments, and North Carolina and Rhode Island at first rejected the Constitution, and except for the agreement to adopt the first 10 amendments and make it more democratic it would have assuredly failed.

George Washington, as President of the Convention, was debarred from sharing in the debates. It had one very great merit—it established the Union. It had one great demerit—it was not democratic.

If a knowledge of the Constitution be a prerequisite to qualify a citizen or a Senator as a candidate for the Supreme Court of the United States, then, with great respect, I humbly submit that the Senator from Utah has not qualified under the rule. Certainly he is not justified in attempting to ridicule the suggestion that the Constitution was not democratic.

> All democratic constitutions are flexible and easy to amend. This follows from the fact that in a government which the people really control the constitution is merely the means of securing the supremacy of public opinion and not an instrument for thwarting it. * * * A government is democratic just in proportion as it responds to the will of the people, and since one way of defeating the will of the people is to make it difficult to alter the form of government, it necessarily follows that any constitution which is democratic in spirit must yield readily to changes in public opinion. (Spirit of American Government.)

An unamendable constitution and a judiciary not responsible to the people is dangerous to the stability of government. When public opinion becomes greatly aroused and can find no expression through the constitution, and the judiciary, as a ruling power, obstructs such public opinion, it may easily lead to revolution and to war, as it did do when the Supreme Court of the United States, by the Dred Scott decision, nationalized slavery, and the Constitution not being amendable by the majority left no apparent remedy but the dissolution of the Union or war.

The Federal court now vetoes acts of Congress and nullifies national policies, such as the control of the trusts or an income tax or other benevolent laws passed in recent years for the protection of the humbler working masses.

The judicial branch can nullify the acts of the legislative branch, although the Constitutional Convention, reactionary though it was, four times refused to grant the right to the Supreme Court to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional.

The Constitution, as drawn, was intended to give a veto to the minority, and to restrain the majority, for the benefit of the minority, and, in plain words, benefit the so-called vested interests, property rights, and special privilege.

The glowing terms of praise which we now hear from the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] of an unamendable constitution, and of a judiciary not responsible to the people, has been the language of special privilege and of the advocates of minority rule and of commercial and political oligarchies since the day this Constitution was framed. It seems an amazing thing that the Senator from Utah should denounce the initiative, the referendum, and the recall, provided for in his own constitution. These are the tools of Democracy. The initiative, the referendum, and the recall are the sword and buckler of the majority. It arms the majority with power and puts the Government in the hands of the people.

Mr. President, by the initiative, the people may initiate any law they do want; and, by the referendum, they may veto any law they do not want; and, by the recall, they can remove from office any official for inefficiency.

I shall not reproach the Senator from Utah for his strange bias, for his point of view that denounces the principles of the constitution of Utah and incidentally denounces the principles of the constitution of Oklahoma; nor would I answer him and his criticisms at all did I not deem it of vast importance to the people of the United States that the mechanism of self-government should be adopted and should not be defeated by the Senator from Utah and those who stand with him.

It is a very significant fact that the Western Newspaper Union is sending out printed plates of this speech against the initiative and referendum and the recall. Who is paying the bills for that tremendous expense? These bills do not pay themselves; somebody is paying a large amount of money to publish these plates which the Western Newspaper Union seem to be furnishing gratis to the country newspapers in Minnesota, in Oklahoma, and everywhere else. It is not a pleasing thing to the Senator from Oklahoma to hear of the press of the country using these plates denouncing the principles of the constitution of Oklahoma and ridiculing the Senator from Oklahoma. The vindication of the opinions of the people and of the constitution of Oklahoma makes an answer unavoidable.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. OWEN. I do.

Mr. REED. Would the Senator from Oklahoma give us some idea of about how much it would cost to furnish these plates to the country press of the United States?

Mr. OWEN. I do not know what the expense would be, but it would be enormous, because the number of country newspapers is very large.

Mr. REED. I am interested in knowing whether the Senator believes that less than $50,000 would be used in covering that expense.

Mr. OWEN. I should not think that $50,000 would begin to cover it.

The triumphant reign of monopoly and of special privilege in this country is due, in my opinion, to a sinister combination between machine politics and organized special privilege. The initiative, the referendum, and the recall is the open door to the overthrow of this dangerous alliance, and this is the reason why South Dakota, Montana, Oregon, Oklahoma, Maine, Missouri, Arkansas, Nevada, and Utah have adopted it in their constitutions, and explains why the legislatures of California, Washington, North Dakota, Wyoming, Colorado, Nebraska, Wisconsin, and Florida have submitted it to the people for constitutional amendment, and why it is an active issue in nearly all of the remaining States of the Union. It explains why Arizona has put this principle in its constitution, and why the people of Illinois voted for it by nearly four to one.

This is a world-wide movement, Mr. President. It is the law of Switzerland, of Australia, and of New Zealand. It is an issue in the Canadian States. It means the rule of the people against the rule of the machine, and it means nothing less than this. And no sophistry and no ridicule and no evasion will ever serve to stop this issue from sweeping the United States. The government of cities by commission, with local initiative, referendum, and recall involves this, and is a part of this movement.

The Senator from Utah was the first Senator to arise and denounce the initiative, the referendum, and the recall, and in doing so he was obliged to denounce the constitution of his own State—"the permanent will of the people" in his own State, according to the words used by the Senator from Utah himself.

Mr. President, men and their opinions are controlled by their education and by their environment. I am subject to this rule, and the Senator from Utah is no exception to it. He obviously gives expression to the views of the controlling powers of his own State outside of the constitution of Utah, and I deem it my duty to call the attention of the Senate and of the country to the fact that the only Senator so far who has denounced the initiative, the referendum, and the recall has done so in the face of the constitution of his own State.

I deem it my duty also, Mr. President, and I perform this duty with painful reluctance because of a sincere personal regard for the Senator from Utah, to call attention to the fact that the ruling power of the State of Utah, whose views, I believe, speak through the Senator from Utah, is openly charged with comprising one of the most powerful political machines, religious hierarchies, and commercial oligarchies ever established on earth. I do not assume to have any personal knowledge of the conditions of that State, but a predecessor to the Senate from Utah, ex-United States Senator Frank J. Cannon, himself raised a Mormon, has set forth in great detail a description of this extraordinary religious and commercial monopoly.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], to whom the Senator from Oklahoma is referring, is not now in the Chamber; he is out of the city. If he were here no doubt he would answer a great many of the insinuations which the Senator has already cast upon him.

I wish to state that if the Senator thinks it proper for him to pick up a magazine article written by a man who he himself ought to know is utterly unworthy of being believed in any way, shape, or form, for the purpose of casting a reflection upon a Senator or a State I am surprised at his idea of justice in such a case. Charges are easily made, but are not so easily proven. I say now to the Senator from Oklahoma that the statements which he has repeated here are absolutely uncalled for, unfounded, and untrue.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I think, if they are untrue, they ought to be demonstrated to be untrue. They have been given the widest publicity throughout the United States. I have seen no adequate answer. I suppose there may be one forthcoming, but I do think that if it is true that Senators are named to this floor by the prophet of the Mormon Church, the Senate of the United States ought to know it, and the country ought to know it. If it is not true, the charge ought to be answered; it ought to be denied; it ought to be shown to be absolutely false, because it affects the good name of the Senate of the United States and of one of the great States of the Union for whose people I have great respect.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma further yield?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suppose this is not the proper place or time for me to discuss this question, but I want to say to the Senator from Oklahoma that I deny the statements, and I say to him and to the country that they are not true. Because there is no denial of published articles which are written by a man for whom no one in his own State has any regard or belief in his word, are they to be accepted as true? And is it possible that the Senator thinks such statements should or could always be followed by a denial? It seems to me that, if that were the case, there are other people who would have to be denying statements made against them almost all the time. I will simply content myself by saying to the Senator that the statements are not true.

Mr. OWEN. Does the Senator think that it ought to go uninquired into?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, Mr. President, I have not expressed an opinion in relation to an inquiry into the matter; but the Senator was reading a statement, and seemingly approving of it as the absolute truth. I am not here to defend the Mormon Church; I was elected by the people of the State of Utah, irrespective of their religious belief, and I represent every man and woman in that State; I do not care what his or her religion may be; I am here as a citizen of the United States; and I will go just as far as the Senator from Oklahoma ever dared go in maintaining every principle of liberty and a clean, an honest, and a representative Government.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I am pleased to have the assurance of the Senator from Utah, but I have deemed it my duty to call the attention of the Senate to this matter, and I think it deserves to be inquired into. Certainly, the provision for the initiative, the referendum, and the recall has been in the constitution of Utah for 10 years. Why has it not been vitalized, and why does the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] denounce the initiative, the referendum, and the recall? Do both Senators from Utah agree to that position? I should like to ask the senior Senator from Utah whether or not he approves the initiative and the referendum or whether he denounces them also?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have taken no part in this discussion, nor do I care to do so at this time. I suppose that when the time comes for a vote the Senator will know where I stand. I have been in the Senate long enough for the Senator himself to know that whatever I believe I so vote.

Mr. OWEN. There has been set forth, Mr. President, a very elaborate description of the commercial oligarchy that controls that State. I have no desire to wound the feelings of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], but I think that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] might well hesitate before he denounces the principles of the constitution of Oklahoma and sends his denunciation broadcast as plate matter.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, does the Senator infer or does he state that I have denounced——

Mr. OWEN. I am not referring to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. The constitution of Oklahoma and sent certain matter broadcast to be printed in the papers?

Mr. OWEN. The junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] did so. He denounced the initiative and referendum, which is a principle of that constitution.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, I misunderstood the Senator——

Mr. OWEN. He denounces the manners of the Senator from Oklahoma, he denounces his knowledge of the constitution, and he denounces the people of Oklahoma, and I suppose from what has appeared in the press that the denunciation has gone out as plate matter. I have no objection to the Senator doing what he thinks proper, but I see fit to answer him.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, I thought that the Senator was referring to me.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, not at all. I did not. I am answering a Senator who denounces the initiative and the referendum on the floor of the Senate which is written in the constitution of his own State. I say that there must be some kind of an explanation of that, and I can not understand any other explanation than that he voices hostility of the ruling powers outside of the constitution of Utah, because I believe the initiative and referendum will break down any commercial or political oligarchy whatever, anywhere, and that the controlling powers of Utah know it and for that reason oppose it.

Mr. Frank J. Cannon, assisted by Mr. Harvey J. O'Higgins, with great solemnity and the most earnest assurance, declare to the people of the United States the truth of the history they have narrated in regard to the ruling powers of Utah in Everybody's Magazine. They declare that the Senators from Utah are named by the Mormon "prophet," Joseph F. Smith, that this church controls the political conditions of Utah, and that they have broken faith with the people of the United States in every promise they have made to conduct the affairs of that State in the spirit of American institutions.

The predecessor of the Senator from Utah, ex-United States Senator, Mr. Cannon, describes the manner in which commercial passports to heaven are given by the Mormon hierarchy to its loyal followers. He fully describes how the Mormons and gentiles alike are exploited by a powerful oligarchy in control of Utah. He describes how the children are hypnotized by early and frequent vows to the church, and how their loyalty is kept constant by everlasting reiteration of vows of loyalty and testimony of loyalty, given from month to month by the individuals thus committed in childhood. For example, he describes how a 14-year-old boy is required to rise and say before the congregation as a creed:

Brethren and sisters, I feel called upon to say a few words. I am not able to edify you, but I can say that I know this is the church and Kingdom of God, and I bear my testimony that Joseph Smith was a prophet and that Brigham Young was his lawful successor, and that the Prophet Joseph F. Smith is heir to all the authority which the Lord has conferred in these days for the salvation of men. And I feel that if I live my religion and do nothing to offend the Holy Spirit, I will be saved in the presence of my Father and His Son, Jesus Christ. With these few words I will give way. Praying the Lord to bless each and everyone of us is my prayer in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

Ex-Senator Cannon describes how the individuals who thus pledge their allegiance are kept in line by the examination and espionage of monthly ward teachers, who enter the homes of the people with authority and see that they are faithful and that they renew or continue to allege their loyalty and fidelity. They teach the simple elemental virtues of Christianity, abstinence from alcohol, tobacco, tea, and coffee, and on this sound foundation of decency and on the pledge of loyalty continually reiterated they lay a foundation of fidelity that makes of the ordinary Mormon a subject of the prophet, a vassal, an obedient follower of the orders—political or commercial—of the prophet.

There never was in the history of the world an oligarchy more thoroughly and completely organized than in Utah, if this narrative be anywhere near the truth.

This description I present to the Senate for the reason that it has gone into every quarter of the United States and, in effect, it is a most serious attack upon the high standing and good name of the Senate of the United States itself, and it requires and demands a thorough-going investigation in order either to establish its falsity or to demonstrate its truth, so that the Senate of the United States and the people of Utah shall be purged of this charge if it be false, or correct the unhappy conditions in Utah if the statement should unfortunately prove to be true.

Mr. Cannon describes in detail and vigor the inordinate greed of Joseph F. Smith, the Mormon prophet, and makes the following statement:

Along with this strain of commercial greed in Smith there is an equally strong strain of religious fanaticism that justifies the greed and sanctifies it to itself. He believes (as Apostle Orson Pratt taught, by authority of the church) that "the kingdom of God is an order of government established by divine authority. It is the only legal government that can exist in any part of the universe. All other governments are illegal and unauthorized. * * * Any people attempting to govern themselves by laws of their own making, and by officers of their own appointment, are in direct rebellion against the kingdom of God."

Smith believes that over this kingdom the Smiths have been, by divine revelation, ordained to rule. He believes that his authority is the absolute and unquestionable authority of God Himself. He believes that in all the affairs of life he has the same right over his subjects that the Creator has over His creatures. He believes that he has been appointed to use the Mormon people as he in his inspired wisdom sees fit to use them, in order the more firmly to establish God's kingdom on earth against the powers of evil.

Messrs. Cannon and O'Higgins, in their last article, use the following headlines:

Political headquarters of the State of Utah. Headquarters of the Mormon Church. Utah-Idaho Sugar Co., Joseph F. Smith, president; Inland Crystal Salt Co., Joseph F. Smith, president; Zion's Savings Bank & Trust Co., Joseph F. Smith, president; State Bank of Utah, Joseph F. Smith, president; Zion's Cooperative Mercantile Institute, Joseph F. Smith, president; Consolidated Wagon & Machine Co., Joseph F. Smith, president; Home Fire Insurance Co., Joseph F. Smith, president; Beneficial Life Insurance Co., Joseph F. Smith, president; Salt Lake Knitting Co., Joseph F. Smith, president; the Deseret News, Joseph F. Smith, president.

They conclude with chapter 20, as follows:

CHAPTER 20.

CONCLUSION.

Of the men who could have written this narrative, some are dead, some are prudent, some are superstitious, and some are personally forsworn. It appeared to me that the welfare of Utah and the common good of the whole United States required the publication of the facts that I have tried to demonstrate. Since there was apparently no one else who felt the duty and also had the information or the wish to write, it seemed my place to undertake it. And I have done it gladly; for when I was subscribing the word of the Mormon chiefs for the fulfillment of our statehood pledges, I engaged my own honor, too, and gave bond myself against the very treacheries that I have here recorded.

We promised that the church had forever renounced the doctrine of polygamy and the practice of plural-marriage living, by a "revelation from God" promulgated by the supreme prophet of the church, and accepted by the vote of the whole congregation assembled in conference. We promised the retirement of the Mormon prophets from the political direction of their followers, the abrogation of the claim that the Mormon Church was the "Kingdom of God" reestablished upon earth to supersede all civil government—the abandonment by the church of any authority to exercise a temporal power in competition with the civil law. We promised to make the teaching and practice of the church conform to the institutions of a republic in which all citizens are equal in liberty. We promised that the church should cease to accumulate property for the support of illegal practices and un-American government.

And we made a record in proof of our promises by the antipolygamy manifesto of 1890 and its public ratification; by the petition for amnesty and the acceptance of amnesty upon conditions; by the provisions of Utah's enabling act and of Utah's State constitution; by the acts of Congress and the judicial decisions restoring escheated church property; by the proceedings of the Federal courts of Utah in reopening citizenship to the alien members of the Mormon Church; by the acquiescence of the Gentiles of Utah in the proceedings by which statehood was obtained; and, finally and most indisputably, by the admission of Utah into equal sovereignty in the Union, since that admission would never have been granted except upon the explicit understanding that the State was to uphold the laws and institutions of the American Republic in accordance with our covenants.

"THE INTERESTS" BACK THE CHURCH.

Of all these promises the church authorities have kept not one. The doctrine and practice of polygamy have been restored by the church, and plural-marriage living is practiced by the ruler of the kingdom and his favorites with all the show and circumstance of an oriental court. There are now being born in his domains thousands of unfortunate children outside the pale of law and convention, for whom there can be entertained no hope that any statute will ever give them a place within the recognition of civilized society.

The prophet of the church rules with an absolute political power in Utah, with almost as much authority in Idaho and Wyoming, and with only a little less autocracy in parts of Colorado, Montana, Oregon, Washington, California, Arizona, and New Mexico. He names the Representatives and Senators in Congress from his own State and influences decisively the selection of such "deputies of the people" from many of the surrounding States. Through his ambassadors to the Government of the United State, sitting in House and Senate, he chooses the Federal officials for Utah and influences the appointment of those for the neighboring States and Territories. He commands the making and unmaking of State law. He holds the courts and the prosecuting officers to a strict accountability. He levies tribute upon the people of Utah and helps to loot the citizens of the whole Nation by his alliance with the political and financial plunderbund at Washington. He has enslaved the subjects of his kingdom absolutely, and he looks to it as the destiny of his church to destroy all the governments of the world and to substitute for them the theocracy—the "government by God" and administration by oracle—of his successors in office.

And yet, even so, I could not have recorded the incidents of this betrayal as mere matters of current history—and I would never have written them in vindication of myself—if I had not been certain that there is a remedy for the evil conditions in Utah, and that such a narrative as this will help to hasten the remedy and right the wrong. Except for the aggressive aid given by the national administrations to the leaders of the Mormon Church, the people of Utah and the intermountain States would never have permitted the revival of a priestly tyranny in politics. Except for the protection of courts and the enforced silence of politicians and journalists, polygamy could not have been restored in the Mormon Church. Except for the interference of powerful influences at Washington to coerce the Associated Press and affect the newspapers of the country, the Mormon leaders would never have dared to defy the sensibilities of our civilization. Except for the greed of the predatory "interests" of the Nation, the commercial absolutism of the Mormon hierarchy could never have been established. The present conditions in the Mormon kingdom are due to national influences. The remedy for those conditions is the withdrawal of national sympathy and support.

WHO IS TO RULE IN UTAH?

Break the power at Washington of Joseph F. Smith, ruler of the Kingdom of God, and every seeker after Federal patronage in Utah will desert him. Break his power as a political partner of the Republican Party now—and of the Democratic Party should it succeed to office—and every ambitious politician in the West will rebel against his throne. Break his power to control the channels of public communication through interested politicians and commercial agencies, and the sentiment of the civilized world will join with the revolt of the "American movement" in Utah to overthrow his tyrannies. Break his connection with the illegal trusts and combines of the United States, and his financial power will cease to be a terror and a menace to the industry and commerce of the intermountain country.

The Nation owes Utah such a rectification, for the Nation has been, in this matter, a chief sinner and a strong encourager of sin.

The Republic must overthrow the modern Mormon kingdom, or that kingdom will sap the honor and power of the Republic. Both can not survive as temporal sovereignties under their present exclusive pretensions. The Republic must vindicate its own jurisdiction, by State and Nation, over the temporal affairs of men within its borders, or it must rest content with such fragments of sovereignty as encroaching ecclesiasts care to leave it. The records of the world may be searched in vain for an instance in which a government deriving its powers from the consent of the governed, and a government claiming to derive exclusive and world-wide authority from God on high, were able to occupy in harmony the same territory. They have never done it; they can not do it now.

HOW UTAH CAN BE FREED.

The Nation need not fear that in breaking the pretensions of the modern Mormon kingdom it will be engaging in a religious persecution. It is not religious persecution to deny the representative of a foreign potentate a seat in our Senate. It is not religious persecution to insist on the observance of a solemn covenant. It is not religious persecution to demand that a hierarchy shall keep out of politics. In my story of the modern Mormon kingdom I have denounced not doctrines, but deception; not the keeping of faith with God, but the breaking of faith with men; not the religion which cheers and sustains, but the hierarchy which hides under the altars of that religion to prey and plunder. The Nation can make the same distinction.

And the Nation owes such a rectification not only to Utah, but also to itself. The commercial and financial plunderbund that is now preying upon the whole country is sustained at Washington by the help of the agents of the Mormon Church. The prophet not only delivers his own subjects up to pillage; he helps to deliver the people of the entire United States. His Senators are not representatives of a political party; they are the tools of "the interests" that are his partners. The shameful conditions in Utah are not peculiar to that State; they are largely the result of national conditions, and they have a national effect. The prophet of Utah is not a local despot only; he is a national enemy; and the Nation must deal with him.

I do not ask for a resumption of cruelty, for a return to proscription. I ask only that the Nation shall rouse itself to a sense of its responsibility. The Mormon Church has shown its ability to conform to the demands of the Republic—even by "revelation from God," if necessary. The leaders of the church are now defiant in their treasons only because the Nation has ceased to reprove and the national administrations have powerfully encouraged. As soon as the Mormon hierarchy discovers that the people of this country, wearied of violated treaties and broken covenants, are about to exclude the political agents of the prophet from any participation in national affairs, the advisers of his inspiration will quickly persuade him to make a concession to popular wrath. As soon as "the interests" realize that the burden of shame in Utah is too large to be comfortable on their backs, they will throw it off. The Presidents of the United States will be unable to gain votes by patronizing the crucifiers of women and children. The national administrations will not dare to stand against the efforts of the Gentiles and the independent Mormons of Utah to regain their liberty. And Utah, the Islam of the West, will depose its old sultan and rise free.

THE TRUTH SHALL TRIUMPH.

With this hope—in this conviction—I have written in all candor what no reasons of personal advantage or self-justification could have induced me to write. I shall be accused of rancor, of religious antagonism, of political ambition, of egotistical pride. But no man who knows the truth will say sincerely that I have lied. Whatever is attributed as my motive, my veracity in these articles will not be successfully impeached. In that confidence I leave all the attacks that guilt and bigotry can make upon me to the public to whom they will be addressed. The truth, in its own time, will prevail, in spite of cunning. I am willing to await that time, for myself and for the Mormon people.

Mr. President, I know nothing about the truth of this matter. It may be absolutely false from beginning to end; it may be utterly unworthy to be uttered, but it is a very serious matter, coming from an ex-Member of this body, ex-United States Senator Frank J. Cannon. I do not know whether it is true or false; I do not pretend to know; but I think that the Senate ought to know the truth of this grave accusation, and ought to know it by a proper investigation and inquiry into it.

Mr. President, I very greatly regret that the principles of the initiative, the referendum, and the recall, which are contained in the constitution of Utah, should be now openly derided and flouted by the Senator from Utah without sound reason or argument. It is very extraordinary that a Senator, holding the honors and the dignities of a State, should ridicule and denounce the principles laid down in the constitution of his own State, but it is no more extraordinary than the fact that five succeeding legislatures in that State should have refused to vitalize the constitution of Utah by passing the necessary statutes for its enforcement. These five legislatures have been urged to perform this duty by those who believe in the doctrine of self-government and in the doctrine of the rule of the majority. The mere fact that these legislatures have refused to perform this obvious duty, and the fact that the Senator from Utah denounces these doctrines of the constitution of Utah, is a circumstance of vast importance in the light of the charge that the Mormon Church as a political and commercial oligarchy controls the political affairs of that State and dictates the appointment of Senators from that State.

Mr. President, I would not willingly say anything that would wound the feelings of the Senator from Utah, but when he uses his position as a Senator to denounce the principles of good government, in which I believe—which I believe of vital importance—when he denounces the initiative and the referendum, when he denounces the principles of government laid down in the constitution of Oklahoma and ridicules the people of Oklahoma, and when his argument goes out all over the United States as a campaign document against the people's rule, it is my duty to the people of Oklahoma and to the cause of popular government to enter a vigorous protest against the argument submitted by the Senator from Utah and to make such answer as will give that argument its proper place before the electorate of the United States.

No one should be surprised that the Mormon Church should oppose the initiative, the referendum, and the recall, and no one should be surprised that the income-tax amendment should be voted down by the Legislature of Utah. (March 9, 1911.)

It is but natural that the Senator from Utah should be powerfully influenced by the opinions of the controlling powers of his State, without whose support I believe he could not appear on the floor of this Chamber. It is but natural that he should give voice to the opinions of those at the head of this religious hierarchy. It is but natural that, under the circumstances of his environment, he should oppose the rule of the majority and oppose those democratic agencies which would overthrow the rule of the minority. It is but natural that he should regard with disapproval the views of the Senator from Oklahoma; that he should ridicule the Senator from Oklahoma and the liberty-loving people of that State; that he should denounce the idea of amending the Consitution of the United States as undemocratic. It would be but natural, Mr. President, in view of the conservative opinions of the Senator from Utah and who appears to believe in the absolute perfection of the Constitution of the United States, that the Senator from Utah should be preferred as a candidate for the Supreme Court of the United States, as ex-United States Senator Cannon alleges.

Mr. President, I have no doubt of the industry, high character, and good citizenship of the great body of the people of Utah,

Mormons and gentiles, and nothing which I have said could be construed as any unkind reference to the people of that State. My reference has been to a religious and commercial oligarchy described by Frank J. Cannon, which appears to be engaged in the governing business in Utah, and which I regard as un-American in the highest degree, and as most injurious to the people of Utah, and especially to the Mormons. The Mormon Church ought to go out of the political business, as it agreed to do. If it is true that the Mormon "prophet" names the Senators from Utah on this floor, and uses the power of a religious hierarchy to accomplish this, he is able to do a positive harm to the people of the United States outside of Utah and to the people of Oklahoma, which I have the honor, in part, to represent.

The mere fact that the Senator from Utah criticized the Senator from Oklahoma and the State of Oklahoma would not have induced me to call attention to this matter had I not felt that the issue of popular government is one of vital importance to the people of the United States.

I might pause to remark that I was not present in the Senate when I was assailed by the Senator from Utah, but I do not complain of it at all, because Senators are so frequently away from the floor that a Senator would have to be silent and be denied the right to criticise the views of a fellow Senator if he could only do so when a Senator were present.

I have been surprised that the Senator from Utah should have gone out of his way to assail Oklahoma and its constitution, and I am willing to believe that it was done in a spirit of levity and ridicule for the purpose of denouncing the doctrine of popular government, for which Oklahoma is distinguished, but I have not been willing to leave this volley of epithet, sarcasm, and ridicule against the principles of the constitution of Oklahoma which her liberty-loving people believe in to remain unanswered.

In answering I have endeavored to do my duty to the people of Utah and to the Republic and to the cause of the popular government in which I deeply and profoundly believe, and to vindicate the great Constitution and to defend the wisdom and the patriotism of my own beloved people of Oklahoma.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments to the original joint resolution, which must be acted upon prior to action upon the substitute.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I can not even hope that any word uttered by me at this stage of the dispute, when the opinions of Senators have become so thoroughly and completely crystallized, can influence the decision which the Senate is about to render upon this important subject. But I feel so deeply the conviction that many Senators with whom I agree upon the recall of judges are about to inflict upon our institutions a severer blow by their votes upon the joint resolution shortly to be submitted to the Senate than could possibly be inflicted by allowing the people of Arizona the privilege of recalling such members of the judicial department as they think ought to be recalled that I am impelled to suggest the reasons which will guide me to the vote I shall cast.

I regret very much that all the emphasis of this debate has been placed upon the wisdom or the unwisdom of establishing in the laws of Arizona the recall of judges. I do not believe that the emphasis of the controversy ought to be placed upon either the initiative, the referendum, or the recall. From my point of view the discussion of the merits of the initiative, the referendum, and the recall are irrelevant and immaterial, if I may use a phrase common in the trial of causes. My vote upon the subject under consideration will not be determined by the opinions I hold concerning these policies of government or concerning either of them.

Lest, however, it may be said that I am unwilling to avow my belief touching these doctrines, I do not hesitate in saying, first, that I believe in a qualified or restricted initiative for direct legislation; second, that I believe in an unqualified and unrestricted referendum for the approval or disapproval of legislative acts; third, I doubt the necessity or wisdom of the recall for legislative and executive officers elected for the short terms now common in this country; fourth, I am opposed to the recall for judges.

I have thus stated my belief with respect to these principles of government, not because I think them material in the controversy before us, but because I desire to escape the reproach that I was unwilling or reluctant to declare before the people of this country just what I believe concerning them. If I believed that my vote for the joint resolution before us, either as reported by the committee or as proposed to be amended by the substitute of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], implied an indorsement of all the constitutional provisions presented by New Mexico and Arizona, I would feel compelled to vote against the approval of both constitutions, for there are many things in each of them that, in my judgment, ought not to be in the organic law of a State.

I can not, however, concur with the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] in his proposition, and it is to that proposition mainly that I desire to address myself in the brief time I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate.

His proposition is that a vote for the admission of Arizona, with the constitution her people have adopted, is equivalent to an assertion by the voter, I mean the senatorial voter, that he believes that it is wise to establish the recall of judges. This can not be a sound proposition, and if I may depart a moment from its abstract consideration and address myself to him and to those who believe with him personally, I can easily prove that it is not a sound proposition.

The constitution of Arizona establishes the unrestricted initiative, the unrestricted referendum, and the unrestricted recall. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] proposes to change but one of these provisions, namely, the recall of judges.

The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], as I understand him and have understood others who follow his leadership, intends, if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota shall be adopted, to vote for the admission of both New Mexico and Arizona. If he so does, he will vote for a constitution which provides, in the case of Arizona, for the unqualified initiative. Will those Senators who have outlined this course for themselves agree that in so doing they are asserting their indorsement of the principle of the initiation of and direct legislation by the people? No.

There is in this constitution the establishment of a system for unqualified referendum to the people of acts of the general assembly or legislature. The Senator from New York does not believe in that principle of government. There is much room for difference of opinion both with respect to the initiative and the referendum. I believe in them, qualified as I have suggested, but the Senator from New York does not believe in them, and yet he, and those who are with him in this respect, apparently intend to vote for the admission of Arizona with this principle implanted in it and established by her constitution.

Now, I am not quarreling with or even criticizing a vote so cast; I believe it is properly cast; but I instance it to show that he does not believe, no Senator can believe, that a vote to admit Arizona with the constitution which her people have adopted is an indorsement of either the referendum, the initiative, or the recall or any other provision in her constitution. It is a statement by each Senator that he believes the constitution adopted by the people of that Territory is not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and it is an assertion of his opinion that it does establish or create a republican form of government, but it is not an indorsement of the policy which the people of that Territory choose to adopt for their own government.

Again, after the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota shall have been adopted, if it be adopted, there will remain in the constitution of Arizona a provision for the recall of short-term legislative and administrative officers. I know from my association with Senators that many of them are not convinced that it is wise or right to incorporate such a provision in the constitution of a State. I believe that many of them, if they were residents of Arizona, would have voted against a constitution with such a provision in it. If they vote for the admission of Arizona is it to be said that they are affirming before the people of this country the wisdom of a system which recalls executive and legislative officers? No; they are voting for the admission of a State, and the only thing which we affirm in voting for the admission of a State with a constitution adopted by the people who are to form the State is that we believe the organic law thus established is in harmony with the Constitution of the whole country, and that under it the people will enjoy a republican form of government.

I join issue with those who believe that we have the right to prescribe a constitution for Arizona or any other Territory which seeks admission to the Union. I do not challenge the power of Congress to exclude the people of Arizona and the people of New Mexico from participation in the Union of States just so long as Congress desires to exclude them. We, however, have passed that stage in this controversy. The enabling act passed a year or more ago, determined that these two Territories, with respect to their population and with respect to their people, their habits, their tendencies, their powers of self-government, were ready for admission to the Union. That is no longer open, as it seems to me, for either discussion or decision, and the only thing that remains for us to determine is whether we shall approve the constitution which they have in fair and properly regulated elections provided for themselves.

The Senator from New York and others who have followed him have said that the enabling act imposes upon Congress the duty of approving these constitutions and his conclusion was that if we find anything in the constitutions which we would not have voted for had we been residents and voters of the Territory, then we ought to vote against the admission of the Territories. I can not believe that that is the law. I believe that when you vote to exclude Arizona because you would not have made for her such a constitution as her own people have provided, you are striking a vital blow upon the institutions of your country.

I know that we have the power to do it. So has a judge the power to render an unjust or a corrupt decision. We must always repose final power somewhere. Our power in this respect is unappealable and unreviewable, and therefore no one can question its exercise. But there is a moral obligation upon those who are invested with power that ought to be as effective, and I believe is as effective, as the formal or verbal power with which we are intrusted.

We are falling into a dangerous tendency in these days, a tendency that I hope the Senate of the United States will speedily correct by its own example. We are becoming careless and indifferent in regard to the exercise of power. If we have the power, if we have the jurisdiction, then we exercise it apparently without much regard for the consequences that may ensue. Courts strain and torture the words of a constitution in order to find in it authority which they believe the Government ought to have, or they strain and torture its words in order to take out of it a power which they think the legislature and the executive ought not to have. It is a sad and demoralizing tendency, and we ought to be the first to cherish the tradition and to cherish the principle that unreviewable power shall be exercised according to the right and morals and justice of the case.

The executives not only of the United States but of the States as well seem nowadays to have no hesitation about invading the powers, the privileges, the rights of the legislative department of the Government. We seem to grow blind to the distinction which our forefathers attempted to draw between these departments of the Government. The legislatures of the States seem to have forgotten that they ought not to control or direct the executives who are elected for the purpose of executing and enforcing the laws, and we invade from time to time a region which, under the Constitution of the United States as well as the constitution of every State in the Union, ought to be free from any intrusion of our department of the Government.

Here we are, a Congress which has the power to say that Arizona and New Mexico shall not be admitted as States until they make and adopt a constitution that fits our ideas of what constitutions should be, and that embodies our views with regard to what the organic law should contain, and we are in grave danger of exercising a power that we undoubtedly have against common right and common justice, and against the fundamental principles which hold the Union together. My proposition is to me as plain and as simple as the most elemental law of mathematics. My proposition is that if Arizona after her admission to the Union may lawfully establish a constitution which she presents to us for her admission to the Union; then we have no moral right, although we have a constitutional power, to say that she shall not enter the Union until she conforms to our view in her policies and her systems of administration.

This is not a new question. I thought at first, when the subject became imminent, that I would endeavor to review the legislative history of the United States upon it. It is exceedingly interesting; it is exceedingly instructive. There was a time when most of the lawyers of the Congress of the United States believed that in admitting a State into the Union Congress could impose a fundamental law upon it, which after admission would be superior and paramount to any change or amendment the people of the States might desire to engraft upon the constitution.

It has been many times attempted in the Congress of the United States to admit States upon such a condition, but always upon the hypothesis that after admission the condition so imposed would be effective and operative against the will of the people of the State. Such was the discussion, for instance, upon the admission of Nebraska to the Union, as you will remember, very soon after the close of the Civil War, and while feeling still ran high, Nebraska had adopted a constitution which limited the suffrage of her people to white men. This was before the adoption of the constitutional amendment, which would now render such a State constitution impossible. The question was whether Nebraska should be admitted to the Union with that sort of a constitution, and one of the most valiant advocates for human rights who ever stood in this Chamber, a man uncompromising in his views, stalwart in all his opinions, brave and fearless as a fighter for the cause he believed to be just, Ben Wade, of Ohio, insisted that Nebraska should enter the Union even with this obnoxious clause in her constitution. It was sought then to impose a condition, and the opposition to the position I am now taking was represented in a resolution which attempted to impose upon Nebraska forever the condition that there should be no discrimination in her constitution so far as race and color are concerned. So this constitutional question, if I may so term it, although I believe it is a moral question rather than a constitutional question, arose and was debated. Senator Wade almost alone stood for the proposition that it was not within the power of Congress to impose upon a State that was to be admitted on an equal footing and with all the rights and privileges of other States a provision which she could not herself remove when admitted to the Union. However, the minority opinion then has become the universal opinion now.

There is no lawyer in this Chamber, there is no lawyer anywhere, who will assert that Arizona could not lawfully, immediately after her admission to the Union, incorporate into her constitution the very provision which now excites the opposition of Senators upon this floor; and no one will contend that having so incorporated the provision by the due process of amendment into her constitution Congress could, by any legislation, either affect that provision of her organic law or disturb her relations to her sister States on account of it.

Is it not in the highest degree illogical, is it not the climax of folly, to say that we have the right to exclude Arizona from the privileges of statehood because she has a provision in her constitution which we do not indorse, and at the same time admit that next year she may exercise all the rights of statehood and incorporate that provision into her constitution, and that then we will be powerless to either amend it or to exclude her from her rights and privileges as a Commonwealth of the Union?

I am not now speaking of our power, but I believe that our right at this time is limited by our power after she shall become a member of the sisterhood of States. If she presented here a constitution which we found in the organic law of some State already admitted and that was repugnant to or inconsistent with the Federal Constitution, or that we believed established a government unrepublican in form, then we could say to her before she entered, "You can not come in"; just as the courts would say to her after she was in that any provision of her constitution inconsistent with the Federal Constitution had no force or effect, and just as Congress could say to any State which would so amend her constitution as to greate a government unrepublican in form, "You must change your constitution or you can no longer enjoy the companionship of republican governments."

To me our duty is plain. I do not intend to emphasize my objections to the recall of judges. I recognize the right of the people to establish such a system in their government; but, as one of the people, I do not believe in that system, and I would do everything in my power to prevent, were I a citizen of Arizona, the establishment of the recall of judges; but in order to carry into effect my views with respect to that subject I am asked here to do infinite violence to the Constitution of my country, infinite violence to the institutions of which we are so proud. I am asked to usurp a power that Congress never ought to exercise, and can not exercise morally, although if it does exercise it there is no appeal from our act in that respect. I ask Senators to pause a moment before they shall attempt to take into their hands rights which are just as sacred to the people of Arizona as are the rights which we enjoy under the Constitution of the country.

I intend, for these reasons, to vote against the substitute for the joint resolution proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and I intend then to vote for the constitutions which the people of these Territories have established. I would vote for them even though the other House had suggested no amendment whatsoever.

I regard the provision in the constitution of New Mexico with respect to the amendment of her constitution as in the last degree tyrannical, as in the last degree indefensible; but it is not for me to say to the people of New Mexico, "You shall amend your constitution thus and thus"; it is for them to declare how they desire to be governed; and so long as they present a constitutional system of organic laws which is in harmony with the Federal Constitution, and which does establish and create a republican form of government, so long will I submit and yield my views upon these matters to the rights, the inalienable and sacred rights, of the people of that Territory.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I listened this morning with a great deal of pleasure to the very able speech of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. I almost made up my mind that, notwithstanding my fixed opinions on this subject, I would vote for the admission of Arizona, letting her, of course, take care of herself and pay the price of her folly; but after thinking about the matter and remembering that men are judged by their votes more than by their speeches I have come to a different conclusion.

I want to say at the outset that there is no Senator in this Chamber who has a greater respect for the opinions of the people than have I, but when I speak of the opinions of the people I speak of opinions formed deliberately in hours of calmness and not of opinions formed in hours of excitement, for the whole history of the world bears me out in the truth of the assertion that at times the people need to be protected from themselves.

More than nineteen hundred years ago the people demanded the crucifixion of the Savior of mankind, and I believe when He was surrendered into their hands by Pontius Pilate that that was the first instance in history of the exercise of the referendum. After He had been crucified and the veil of the temple had been rent in twain and darkness and earthquakes came history fails to record that the people ever recovered their reason and asked for the recall of Pontius Pilate.

Mr. President, I want to give this Senate the advantage of a little history in our State showing how uncertain the voice of the people is at times and how dangerous would be the proposition to allow the recall of judges. In 1818, I believe, times were hard in Kentucky. The people rose up and demanded that a State banking system should be created. The legislature met, and in response to that overpowering call incorporated 46 banks with a capital of $9,000,000. In less than one year disaster came upon the State; in less than one year the only bank we had in Kentucky that was reliable—the old Bank of Kentucky—suspended, and in less than one year all of the 46 banks had gone into bankruptcy. That was an appalling period.

The legislature met in 1820 and repealed the charters of the 46 banks, leaving the banking system of the State in its original condition; but again the cry of the people was raised; hard times were upon us, and the people demanded that there should be something else done by the creation of a bank. So when the next legislature met it created a bank called the Bank of the Commonwealth. It was capitalized at $2,000,000 and authorized to issue $3,000,000 of circulating notes, which were made a legal tender for the payment of all debts. Again the State went even deeper into despondency and disaster. A wave of trouble and financial ruin swept over it from one end to the other. In the midst of this an appeal was made to the judiciary by a petition filed before Judge Clark, a circuit judge.

When that petition was filed, asking that this law should be held unconstitutional, his life was threatened and every attempt made to intimidate him by a frenzied populace; but he arose to the exigency of the occasion and decided that the law was unconstitutional. Then it was that the people of the State went into a perfect frenzy, and the result was that they determined that this man should be addressed out of office. They went to work and established a party called the Relief Party, which assumed the name of the People's Party. In the succeeding election they obtained an overwhelming majority of the legislature and elected Gov. Adair, who was in sympathy with them. The result was that after this was done Gov. Adair called the legislature into special session.

When Judge Clark was summoned before them to answer for the judgment he had rendered he did answer in a brave, fearless, able way, and they were unable to obtain the two-thirds majority to address him out of office. What did they do? They finally agreed that they would let the matter rest until the court of appeals could pass on it. So they passed it until 1823, when the court of appeals of Kentucky, rising like brave men and true to the spirit of the situation, decided that the judgment of Judge Clark was right and that the law was unconstitutional, because it impaired the obligation of contracts. What was done then? These same frenzied people, for the purpose of putting out of office the judges of the court of appeals——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Kentucky submit to an interruption?

Mr. BRADLEY. Certainly.

ADMIRAL COUNT HEIHACHIRO TOGO, IMPERIAL JAPANESE NAVY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to announce that the Senate has as its guest Admiral Count Heihachiro Togo, Imperial Japanese Navy.

Mr. ROOT (at 4 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.). Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until a quarter before 5 o'clock to enable its Members to pay their respects personally to our distinguished guest.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate thereupon took a recess, when the Members of the Senate were presented to Admiral Count Heihachiro Togo, Imperial Japanese Navy, and the members of his suite.

[Before the party withdrew from the Chamber the Vice President said: "Admiral Count Heihachiro Togo expresses his thanks to the Senate. He does not know that all Senators heard him, and so he has asked me to voice his thanks for him."]

At the expiration of the recess the Senate reassembled.

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 14) to admit the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona as States into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, it requires, as one of my friends suggested a moment ago, the Japanese Navy to take a Kentuckian off his feet, and now that we have returned from Japan, in a very few moments I shall conclude what I have to say.

I recite this history of affairs in Kentucky because I believe it is instructive. After the court of appeals had decided that the law was unconstitutional, not having the necessary two-thirds to address the judges out of office, the Relief Party went to work to hold another election, for the purpose of electing a sufficient number to address the judges of the court of appeals out of office.

Meanwhile laws had been passed increasing the time for replevin and staying issual of execution in order to prevent collection of debts.

The point of frenzy which had been reached by the people at that time seriously threatened civil war. They had an election, Gov. Desha being the candidate of the Relief Party for governor. The result of that election was again an overwhelming victory for those who believed in relief. However, there was not yet a two-thirds majority. The legislature met; the matter was taken up; and finding that they could not address the judges out of office they concluded to and did pass an act abolishing the court of appeals and creating another court in its place, providing for three judges, and the governor proceeded to appoint these three judges. They took their places, but the old court refused to abdicate, holding the act unconstitutional, and so we had two courts, the highest court in the State, in existence at the same time. The records of the old court were seized and placed under guard. In consequence of this nothing could be done. Everything was thrown into uncertainty.

This condition of affairs existed until the State was well-nigh bankrupt, and in 1825 another election was held. By this time the people, who had been absolutely crazy for a period of nearly seven years, recovered their reason, elected a majority of anti-relief men to the legislature, who repealed the law creating the new and reinstated the old court.

Now, this is the history of the popular voice in Kentucky. This is the history of wild and unreasonable clamor. Here were the people demanding that men should be removed from office simply because they had discharged their duty. The judiciary was torn in pieces, and yet the fight went on until the State was well-nigh ruined.

I think it proper that this matter of history should be recited before the Senate to show the uncertainty of the people as to the recall of judges. If they had possessed the power, they would have recalled Clark and the judges of the court of appeals; and if this had been done we would have had anarchy and civil war in Kentucky, which would have destroyed the State. Therefore I want to record myself as opposed to any constitution that authorizes the recall of judges.

Some Senators have said that the State, if admitted, even without the recall, would have a right, after it became a State, to pass the recall by amending its constitution, and therefore, although opposed to the recall, they would vote for admission. I have only one word to say about that. I suppose they are similarly situated as the old German who was asked to contribute to buy a lightning rod to put over a church. He refused to do it, and gave this as his reason: "The church is the Lord's, and the lightning is the Lord's. If the Lord wants to take his own lightning and knock down his own church, that is the Lord's business."

So I suppose the idea of these Senators is that the State belongs to the people of Arizona, and if they want to adopt a constitution which will destroy their own State, that is their business, and they ought to be allowed to adopt it and be admitted into the Union, but I can not give a vote here that will send my record down in history as approving anything of that sort. I do not believe that the recall is republican. It think it is the destruction of one of the great departments of government, the judiciary, and the destruction of the judiciary will lead to confusion and ruin.

Recognize such a principle as this and you make every judge a coward. Why? Because when he comes to decide a case the first thing he will do will be to try to ascertain what the people want, for fear the people will put him out of office if he fails to indorse them, and the result of it will be that their will, however frenzied, will be carried out, and that there will be no independence in the judiciary. I can not give a vote that will lead to the belief that I indorse a thing of this sort either directly or indirectly. The judiciary is the harbor of safety. It may be resorted to when the legislative or the executive departments, controlled by political passion or interest or by the excitement of the hour, do things which are extravagant or dangerous. The last appeal of the citizen, the last appeal of the despised minority, the last appeal of the oppressed is to the courts of the country, and if the courts are to be hampered in their action, if they are to be made cowards in their opinions, then I say we may bid farewell to liberty and give ourselves over to anarchy and destruction.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, the joint resolution to admit New Mexico and Arizona to statehood came from the House and was referred to the Committee on Territories of the Senate. Before that committee hearings were had. Everyone who desired to be heard had his opportunity to present his facts, submit his suggestions, and declare his opinion. After full hearings the Committee on Territories, by an overwhelming majority, declared in favor of the resolution in the form now presented and directed the chairman of the committee to report it to the Senate with the recommendation that it do pass. The senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] presents an amendment to the resolution. As every Senator who has spoken professes to favor statehood for these Territories, the only questions before the Senate arise on the proposed amendment; and what are these?

Both from representations made before the committee by reputable citizens of New Mexico, and on the face of the instrument itself, it became apparent that the New Mexico constitution practically locked away from the people of the proposed State the possibility of future amendment. To supply an opportunity to correct this mischief, the resolution provides for the submission to the people of that Territory a modification of their constitution, prescribing a more liberal procedure for amendment. This proposed modification goes to the people of the Territory as a single, distinct proposition, to be voted up or down, as the electors may determine for themselves. The resolution is in no sense coercive on New Mexico, as her admission is made to depend, not on her acceptance of the proposed modification, but on her submission of it to the will of her people for either adoption or rejection, as they see fit.

Against this provision of the resolution the amendment submitted by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] preserves and approves the novel and extraordinary provision of the New Mexico constitution, which renders amendment well-nigh impossible. On the other hand, the resolution as reported is not only not unusual or extraordinary, but has excellent authority back of it. It enables the Legislature of New Mexico to submit to the people of New Mexico an amendment to their constitution on the same terms and by precisely the same vote as is required by the constitution of Minnesota to submit an amendment to the people of that State.

Now as to Arizona. The people of Arizona saw fit to incorporate in their constitution a provision authorizing the recall of public officials. The resolution as reported requires that the Territory submit an amendment to such provision to the effect that such recall shall not apply to judges. This amendment would go to the people of Arizona as a single question, unentangled with and separated from any and all other provisions in their constitution. Nor is the resolution made coercive on the will of Arizona. It only requires a review and determination of the narrow and precise question of the recall of judges under such auspices as to free it from the innumerable other considerations that attend a vote on a constitution as a whole, and, on such review and determination, admits Arizona to statehood, with the tenure of office of her judiciary as she shall have ordained it. As against this procedure, the Nelson amendment requires Arizona to submit a like amendment to her constitution and then to adopt it at the ensuing election, or be denied statehood.

Mr. President, I am unwilling that the case before the Senate shall be tried on a frivolous pleading and a false issue. The senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] cites the recent case of Coyle against Oklahoma in the United States Supreme Court. In that case the court held that the State of Oklahoma was not bound by the provision in her constitution accepting the restriction in the enabling act of Congress against changing the location of her State capital for a term of years. Under this and numerous other decisions it is manifest that while your coercive amendment may constrain Arizona to strike the recall of judges from her constitution as the price of her admission, she immediately on her admission could proceed to restore it. Vain strategy is spurious strategy. One of the first and fundamental questions confronting Congress on an application for admission to statehood is whether the constitution presented is the will of the people of the Territory. The attempt, even if successful, to temporarily substitute the will of Congress for the will of the people of Arizona can accomplish no beneficient purpose. The natural effect of the ungracious challenge to the intelligence and patriotism of that people would be to provoke and aggravate the alleged distemper which the Senator from New York professes to fear.

The Senator from New York says that a vote for the resolution as reported is a vote in favor of the recall of judges. I suggest that the Senator reexamine the resolution. Words of approval are nowhere there employed. The resolution expressly requires that question to be resubmitted to the people of the Territory. The question is not whether Senators believe in the recall of judges. The resolution does not require Senators to believe in or approve of the recall of judges. The test is not, and never has been, that Congress must believe in and subscribe to everything in the constitution presented by an applying Territory. Had such been the test in the past, we would have no Union of 46 States to-day. If the Territory in other respects is qualified for statehood, and presents a constitution that does not contravene the Federal Constitution and does create a republican form of government, it is sufficient that Congress be satisfied that such constitution is the will of the people of the Territory.

A number of the earlier State constitutions provided for recall of judges by the governor. Nearly all of the State constitutions of to-day authorize the recall of judges by the legislature. For some years past Oregon has had the recall of judges by the people. Thus far not a single petition for such recall has been filed in that State. I can not conceive of such recall as being necessary or expedient or wise in Indiana. Our judiciary is elective and the term of office six years. At the end of this period the judge retires, or in due time must submit his record as a judge and his character as a man for approval or disapproval at the polls. But whatever may be the tenure of the judiciary in the several States to-day, each State at and after its admission to the Union ordained its judiciary agreeably to the will of its own people. We are no more commissioned to form a constitution for Arizona than we are to dictate a constitution to New York or Indiana. And it is idle to attempt to distinguish between Congress prescribing a constitution for a people applying for statehood and excluding such a people from statehood until they bring a constitution that conforms in all substantial respects to the will of Congress.

A fictitious and misleading issue becomes confusing to those who advance it. By his own logic the senior Senator from New York and those who agree with him are required by their vote for the Nelson amendment to approve that device for primary legislation known as the initiative. The recall of public officials is a condition attached to the tenure of elective office. The initiative is more fundamental in character and touches more vitally the chemistry of government. The Senator quotes with fervid approval the noble response of the men of Massachusetts in 1776 in denying the appeal of their temporary legislature for permission to form a constitution for their State. Those men had felt the touch of sinister power. They were unwilling to trust even their own representatives to form a constitution when they had not been selected and instructed with special reference to that high function. Yet the Nelson amendment requires the Senate to force on distant Arizona a constitution other than that ordained by her own people or close against her the door of admission to statehood.

The Senator improvised and exhibited to us startling hypothetical cases of a court under the terror of a recall. He concluded by invoking the trial of Louis XVI, and parading before the Senate the specters of Marat and Danton and Robespierre. This reference to history proves too much to be of value to the Senator's cause. It reminds us that only two generations before that trial, a Louis XIV, in his pride of power and contempt of the people, exclaimed, "I am the state!" The exclamation was true, and described government in France. The French people were, and through their whole history had been, excluded from participation in political power. They felt the touch of that power only in the merciless burdens it brought them. Their only function was to contribute their sweat and blood and tears to maintain the splendor of a throne and feed the profligacy of a court. There was no open field of popular rights, no opportunity to develop and train the temper, the faculties, the capacities for government. Centuries of despotism left no sense of true freedom. The sense of wrong and resentment toward power remained. Liberty, equality, and fraternity were empty names. When the flood of pent-up passion broke over France the fraternity of vengeance and the equality of death seized the scepter.

Freedom is a growth, not a creation, and the great trinity in France was but half made up. Liberty could stagger and plunge, but was incapable of regular step or orderly course. Louis XVI became the sacrificial victim. He loved France, but was helpless to arrest a storm, the fury of which had been gathering long before he was born. He inherited his fate as he inherited his crown and the system of power that came with it. That system was the seedtime; the revolution was the harvest. His trial was a grotesque mockery of law, as had been the system of power a mockery of justice. Marat and Danton and Robespierre were the sanguinary usufruct of what had gone before. That trial and these names present no parable pertinent to this debate except an admonition against the mistaken maxims of power which measure the stability, efficiency, and beneficence of government by its distance from the people.

If history is to be invoked, Mr. President, I prefer that which suggests something of the genesis of popular government and illustrates the real dangers against which its founders in this country sought to intrench it. When the civilization of the west disappeared in the deepening gloom of the Dark Ages there survived in the forests of Germany a fierce, stiff-necked, indomitable, freedom-loving people, who in their primitive way associated liberty with law. They maintained the right of assembly to consult and devise measures for the common weal. They established and maintained a rude form of trial by jury. With their loud yeas and nays they elected leaders, not masters, and impressed their will on their government. When those hardy Angles and Saxons invaded England they bore with them these rudiments of civil liberty and rooted them into the soil of British policy and jurisprudence.

The growth was slow and painful, but persistent. The harvest from that ancient seedtime appears in the Magna Charta, wrung from the unwilling King John; in a Coke holding the broad shield of the law between a trembling subject and his enraged king; in a Bill of Rights forced from resisting prerogative; in defiant resistance to the principles of the ship money and the tea tax; in an American Declaration of Independence and the successful struggle to maintain it; in a Federal convention and Constitution, creating a Union of States and providing that the "United States shall guarantee to every State in the Union a republican form of government"; in an early amendment to that Constitution providing that all powers not delegated to the United States "nor prohibited to the States are reserved to the States respectively, or the people"; and in innumerable other acts and agencies by which the champions of civil liberty took pledges to the peace, order, and security of society.

Our political and civil institutions were not born of some sudden upheaval that inverted society and dissolved all government, but of a long and arduous struggle to fix bounds to power and enforce the recognition and observance of rights. Their heraldry runs in unbroken strain through a thousand years. In the long struggle were fashioned the character, the faculty, the capacity for self-government. Distrust of power became well-nigh a religion. The men who adopted the guaranty to every State of "a republican form of government" were profoundly distrustful of power. They had learned in the school of bitter experience that nothing can bind, or restrain, or circumscribe, or limit, or chain the power of government but power. Think you that by this provision of the Constitution those men sought to establish brakes and erect barriers against the power of the people? All the debates on this provision in the convention and all the decisions of the courts construing it uniformly show it an inhibition against monarchy or aristocracy or oligarchy within a State and not a restraint on the popular element in government.

The lesson that history enforces is that within the limitations fixed in the Federal Constitution the principle of local self-government should be recognized and respected by Congress. You do not want the recall of judges in New York. You are not required by the pending resolution to have it. I do not want the recall of judges in Indiana. I am not required to have it. Other Senators do not want it in their States. They are not required to have it. Many States have provisions in their constitutions which the people of other States would not tolerate in their own State constitutions. Under our system these differences can never become the subject of dispute or discord or rancor. Each State is free to ordain the constitution best suited to its own interests and conditions. This adaptability of the system to the varying and diverse opinions, institutions, necessities, and situations inevitable over a wide region of territory is its strength, its glory, and its beneficence.

As the constitution of a State is apt to reflect the civil history and political experience of the people who framed it, so radical provisions in a constitution presented by a Territory are usually efforts to take bonds against radical wrongs suffered under Territorial government. The Territory is governed from Washington. That there have been appointments of men of splendid talents and inflexible integrity to Federal service in the Territories, I personally know. There also have been fished up from the sluices of subterranean politics in the States and thrust on the people of Arizona men who hardly would have been trusted to referee a dog fight in the communities from which they came. These men made merchandise of their trusts, and treated the people with the disdain characteristic of irresponsible power. If there ever was a community that earned the right to harbor the distrust that some writer has described as divine, it is the community going through the vicissitudes of Territorial government.

As if to justify anew this distrust, it is whispered around the Senate that unless the Nelson amendment be adopted the resolution will encounter opposition elsewhere and not become law. I can not anticipate tawdry heroics. There is no room in the situation for a Leonidas at the Pass or an Horatius at the Bridge. Arizona is at the mercy of the Federal Government. Congress has the right to admit her to statehood and the naked power to exclude her from it on whatever pretext or on no pretext whatever. But to require her to strike from her constitution on the day before her admission what confessedly she may lawfully restore the day after admission is to do a foolish thing. It is the kind of offensive challenge that arouses the passions it pretends to curb. It augments and accentuates the alleged mischiefs it pretends to correct. It magnifies and vitalizes an incident into a cause. It exhibits Federal power as blindly attempting to control as a matter of prerogative that which the people of the Territory are entitled to control as a matter of right.

The resolution as reported commits no such follies. It isolates the question of the recall of public officials as applied to judges from all other questions in the constitution presented by Arizona. Then it puts up to the people of that Territory this question for reexamination and review free from every distracting influence. It leaves the subject of what the tenure of office shall be to determination by the people who must work out their destiny under the constitution as they ordain it. It leaves to every speech made in the Senate against the recall of judges its rightful influence on that determination. It sounds no note of truculent menace or threat or coercion. It presents a procedure becoming alike to the justice of Congress and the rights of a people who aspire to membership in the Union of States.

Moreover, Mr. President, suppose the electors of Arizona shall choose to abide their constitution as it was made. Think you that because of that a black tide of political and social disintegration is to engulf the United States in a common ruin? No American community has yet committed political and social suicide. It is the right of a free people to err, and retrieve the error. It is their right to make mistakes and lose and profit by them. It is their right to stumble and recover. The way of civil liberty is thick with thorns, not strewn with roses. Whether the radicalism of the Arizona constitution prove a delusion or a success, the country will mark the experiment and gain by the lesson.

All questions as to the eligibility and qualifications for statehood of Arizona touching her resources, population, institutions, and the character of her people were foreclosed by the enabling act and require no discussion here. Certain it is that Arizona was not settled and built up by cowards or weaklings or defectives. These shrank from the struggle and remained at home to bewail all change as decay. Only the strong and the brave spirits dared the hardships and dangers of the wilderness and pushed outward the frontiers of western civilization. It was men and women of faith and courage that settled Arizona, organized order, uncovered her resources, built schools, churches, libraries, and promoted those other agencies of social progress that have enfranchised her for statehood. The spirit, temper, and character of her people are nobly illustrated in that striking personality, who, through nearly a quarter of a century, served her at this capital. Senators about me well remember with what commanding intelligence, iron courage, tireless vigilance, and unfaltering fidelity on all occasions through all those years he asserted the rights and guarded the interests intrusted to his care.

It is to such a people that the plan of the Nelson amendment is addressed. Section 2 of that amendment requires that on the same day on which the people of Arizona vote on striking from their constitution the recall of public officials as applying to judges they shall also vote for candidates for all of the State, congressional, legislative, judicial, county, and other offices created by their constitution. If the provision to strike out fails at the polls, then the election is made a nullity. In other words, all the trusts, honors, and emoluments of all the offices created by the new constitution are thrown into a jack pot and tendered as the lofty instrumentality with which to compose and settle the judiciary of the incoming State! I do not pretend to understand high professions of devotion to the principle of a fearless, impartial, and incorruptible judiciary when coupled with support of a proposition the political morality of which scarcely rises to the level of total depravity. I do know that it is the inseparable fate of the championship of power as against the championship of rights to be associated only with low standards and sordid ideals and to find its fittest agencies only in corrupting influence and debauching methods. It is within the naked prerogative of the Senate on the vote about to be taken to strike Arizona as she waits at the door of statehood with the lash of blind and unreasoning power. If we deliver this stripe, the shame will be ours, not hers. When the last insolence of office shall have been exhausted, Arizona will enter on her rightful estate. The stripe here delivered will have fallen away. The record here made would remain the only memorial and a memorial only to the unspeakable littleness that could inflict it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I shall not, under the circumstances, detain the Senate more than a few moments. The discussion of this question has proceeded upon the assumption that Arizona was a State; that there was some element of sovereignty that must be respected by Congress; that we must, in settling this question, deal with the constitution as though it were the organic, sovereign law of a State. Much of false logic has resulted from that false premise.

Arizona is simply a Territory subject to the absolute will of Congress, and the people there are not sovereign in any sense of the word. We have authorized her to experiment on making a constitution. We did that with the constitutional limitation always in view. We can not make two kinds of States. There must be uniformity in the character of State government. Under the Constitution, who is it who is to guarantee this principle? The language is, "the United States shall guarantee to every State a republican form of government." If this becomes a State on the very instant that it crosses the line between the unorganized and the organized political body and into the realm of statehood, that principle applies; and when she knocks at the door the question is, "Have you complied with section 4 of Article IV of the Constitution?" That is what we are doing now. These people have not any sovereign rights as yet, and it is a question as to whether or not they are going to receive them. Section 4 says:

The United States shall guarantee to every State—

Mark you, it is the United States that does it, all of them. The United States as a Government shall guarantee—

To every State in this Union—

And of course you write in there the words, "or that may come into the Union"—

a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion—

She has assumed more than a passive attitude; she has assumed responsibility when they become States of protecting them against foreign and domestic strife. I read on:

and on application of the legislature, or of the executive—when the legislature can not be convened—against domestic violence.

That is a very important provision to bear in mind in determining our action in this matter.

Senators have talked about the right that we would violate. We are not here to take away any right or to violate any right of citizenship. We are here only to determine whether or not we shall grant statehood and on what terms.

A republican form of government, as was said by Mr. Madison, and it is the best pronouncement that has been made of any yet upon that question, is one where the people exercise a government through their representatives and not directly, as in town meeting. Mr. Madison has elaborated on that provision more than once, and it is the accepted legal principle that a republican form of government is a representative government, where the people act only through their representatives.

Now, how can you harmonize that with a referendum? If the people en masse are to make a law, is that a republican form of government? I think not. We are here to see that Arizona, if she becomes a State, shall come within the rule of a republican form of government. The proposed constitution is not within sight of that rule.

There is mighty little room for sentiment in dealing with this question. It is a legal question. The question before us is as to the legal sufficiency of the proposed constitution. It violates the rule of a republican form of government in almost its every provision. They have undertaken to strike out on new lines in government that bear no resemblance to the lines of a republican form of government.

I would not support the constitution adopted by the people of New Mexico because it contains that provision in regard to the referendum, which is nonrepublican in principle. I would not support the constitution of Arizona because it provides for the recall of officers other than in the manner recognized since the foundation of this Government. I would not permit the child to come into the household and change the whole arrangement of it. I would not permit the child to come into the household with a demand that it should be governed by rules other than those that had been tried out and found sufficient. We want no freaks in this household of States. We want these people to come in along conservative lines, and to stay there as a conservative political organization.

For those reasons, and for others not necessary to enumerate, because those reasons are sufficient, but for the reasons I have stated I shall vote against the recognition of both of these constitutions, and I shall ask for a division of the question as between the two Territories asking for admission.

Mr. President, there are many questions, did the time permit, that I should like to express myself briefly upon, but I realize that at this hour and under the circumstances that surround us it would be inappropriate to do so; but before closing I desire, in the presence of Senators, to give them an example of what the referendum is. There [exhibiting] is an official ballot in one of the States of the Union that was submitted at the last election under the referendum provision. It is impracticable to have it made a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; it is 7 feet long, 14 inches wide, and is printed in pica. I do not know how many thousand words it contains, though I had intended to have them counted, but I ask that that ballot be printed as a public document in order that it may be available as an example and as a warning to people who may hereafter propose this kind of freak legislation. (S. Doc. No. 88.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request will be complied with.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the admission of Arizona as provided for in this resolution obviates a very serious objection which I felt to her admission as proposed in the resolution on which the Senate voted toward the close of the last session. The pending resolution proposes the admission of these two Territories without expressly committing any Senator to any or to all of the provisions contained in their constitutions, whereas the joint resolution on which the Senate voted at its last session distinctly and expressly approved the constitution of Arizona. I was not able then, nor am I able now, to understand how any Senator could vote for a resolution expressly approving a constitution unless he in fact approved it. The question as it is presented now is so different from what it then was that I would vote for it if I believed that the Arizona constitution establishes a republican form of government.

I can not, however, vote for the admission of a State whose constitution establishes the initiative and referendum system of legislation, because I do not believe that such a system constitutes a republican form of government. The men who framed the Federal Constitution thoroughly understood the different kinds of government. They understood that there were monarchies, aristocracies, and democracies, and they understood that democracies were divided into two kinds, a direct or pure democracy, and a representative democracy, which they called a republic.

I can no more believe that a system of government which commits the legislative function to the people in their primary and collective capacity is a republican form of government than I could believe that a system which chose a man to act as governor for life and then authorized him to appoint the legislature of a State would be a republican form of government. I shall not now detain the Senate with a discussion of that question, but on some future occasion I shall do so, and if no measure comes before us making it appropriate, it is my purpose, when the Senate shall have ample time, to introduce a resolution and to discuss it at length.

However, Mr. President, I want to say—and that is the purpose for which I rose—that, in my opinion, the attack upon the Arizona constitution has been made at the wrong point. The recall is infinitely less objectionable to me than either the initiative or referendum, and the referendum is not half so objectionable to me as is the initiative.

As I understand the question, the initiative certainly, and the referendum in slighter degree, proposes an abandonment of the principle of representative government and substitutes direct legislation by the people for legislation by their representatives. That violates, it seems to me, the very basic principle of this Republic. But the recall, sir, if a mistake at all, is a mere mistake of administration and not a mistake of principle. The recall is neither more nor less than the establishment of an official tenure at the pleasure of the people. It fixes a maximum term beyond which the officer can not serve without going back to the people for a renewal of his commission, but within that limit he holds his place simply at the pleasure of the people.

I must not be understood as giving my sanction to such a proposition, for I am sure that while it is merely an administrative mistake it is still a grave mistake, which will, in time, drive from the public service the men most worthy to perform it. I am absolutely certain that high-minded men, men of great intellect and exalted character, would not take the chance of passing through a contest for a nomination and then an election to procure an office when they understood that within 60 days after they entered upon the discharge of its duties they might be called upon to face still a third contest to retain it. I have no opinion clearer or firmer than that which leads me to believe that the recall applied to all officers of the government would ultimately deter the very class of men whose service the State and the Republic ought to seek from accepting these great offices. But the men who advocate the recall and apply it to all officers, including judges, are consistent, and you deceive yourselves if you think that you can apply the recall to executive and legislative officers without ultimately applying it to judicial officers. Do not lay that flattering unction to your souls. Let me tell the venerable Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], for whose patriotism and for whose wisdom I entertain a profound respect, that if his amendment should prevail Arizona would come into the Union, and, moved to resentment by the very condition which you had imposed upon her, before her statehood was a year old she would submit this same constitutional amendment to her people and they would adopt it. It makes no difference whether you adopt the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota or you pass the joint resolution as it is proposed by the committee, it is certain that the people of Arizona will not abandon the recall of judges at the behest of the American Congress; and they ought not to do so. If the initiative, the referendum, and the recall constitute a republican form of government, then, sir, it is a matter for the people of Arizona to determine for themselves, and you trifle with the most serious problem in this joint resolution when you tell them to eliminate the recall of judges and still leave the initiative and the referendum.

Mr. President, I am about to say what no Senator in this body, perhaps, will agree with—I might safely go further and say that I am about to say what no man in this country will agree with now, but when they test this system they will all come to an agreement with it later. If I must choose between fools or rascals for judges and fools or rascals for legislators, I will take the fool and the rascal for a judge; and I will do so because, if you have wise legislators, who make just and wholesome laws, no judge will ever be foolish enough or degraded enough to sit in the presence of the people and construe those laws against the plain letter of them. On the other hand, if you have ignorant and corrupt legislators, then, sir, you must have unwise or corrupt legislation, and the greatest curse that can fall upon the Nation is to have their laws made in ignorance or in corruption. It is not the judge I fear, sir, so much as it is the legislator, for, after all, the judge must read the law as the legislator writes it, and the jury must decide the case according to the testimony as witnesses deliver it. Give us wise men to make our laws, and I will have no fear about the men who construe them or the men who execute them.

I am not sure, Mr. President, but it is the present inclination of my mind, though I speak it with some reserve and I may subsequently modify it, that if I were compelled to declare my belief to-day, I would say that I would rather the multitude should assemble in front of this Capitol and decide the law as already made than to see it assemble and make the law which wise and upright men would be compelled to construe. The common is no place to make the law, and the common is no place to construe the law. Lawmaking requires special, particular, profound knowledge. I do not flatter all legislators with the suggestion that they possess such knowledge, but they must possess it if they are qualified for their task, and here in these assembly chambers of the Nation and down in the assembly chambers of the several States alone can wise and equal laws be made for the people of these States and of this Republic.

I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, because a vote for it seems to say, at least by inference, that if Arizona will not recall her judges she may recall her legislators, her governors, and all of her other officers. It also permits her to set her legislature adrift without recalling them, and through her initiative and referendum to substitute direct legislation by the people for legislation by their representatives. Because I can not subscribe to that view, Mr. President, I shall vote against that amendment, and because I can not subscribe to what this joint resolution seems to imply, although it does not expressly declare it—and in that respect it is incomparably less offensive than the old one—I shall vote against it. If I believed that this constitution erected in Arizona a republican form of government, I would support it, but believing, as I do, that the initiative, coupled with the referendum, and both of them coupled with the recall, establishes a direct democracy as contradistinguished from a representative democracy, which in modern times we call a republic, I can not support it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona are applying to be admitted to the Union of States, basing their applications upon constitutions which have been adopted by a popular vote, pursuant to an enabling act passed by Congress. Both of these constitutions contain provisions which are objectionable—one ultraconservative in character, in that it places undue restraint upon the people of New Mexico in the exercise of the power of amendment of their constitution; the other ultraradical, in that its provision for a recall does not confine the contest to the mere consideration of the record of the incumbent, but entangles that consideration with another, and that is the contest of a rival candidate who may have superior power, influence, and popularity, and who upon those grounds, and not upon the bad record of the incumbent, may succeed to the place.

Mr. President, I represent in part a State whose legislation for many years has been of a progressive and advanced character. Years ago we destroyed the corporate oligarchy which controlled both parties in that State and whose visé was necessary to success, and we established popular government. We have established there the initiative, the referendum, and the recall. We have established the direct primary. We have established the Oregon plan of selecting United States Senators through the agency of a primary, and as the result of these increased powers of the people legislation and the administration of that State have been measurably improved.

We have to-day upon the statute books measures which were denied recognition for years, and which were demanded by right and justice—an employers' liability law, an 8-hour-day law, an act organizing a railroad and public-utilities commission, recognized throughout the intermountain and Pacific coast region as one of the most capable and efficient commissions of the country.

We have exercised there the power of referendum with reference to a statute involving in the highest degree the question of law and order—a referendum inaugurated in the heat of passion, but conducted throughout its discussion with temperance and terminating in a popular decision, which upheld public order, a contest absolutely educational to the entire people of the State in all the essential principles of free government and carrying with it not only the beneficial result then determined, but an educational effect that will be far-reaching in its results in the history of that State.

And so, Mr. President, I stand as the friend and the advocate of these advanced measures in the adoption of which Oregon and Wisconsin have been so conspicuous, and under these measures the State which I represent is as thorough an evidence of free government and absolute self-government by the people themselves as can be indicated anywhere in the country.

Mr. President, I am inclined to share with the Senator from Idaho the view that we are not to attach any great overwhelming sanctity to the action of Territories asking admission to the Union of States, mere infant communities about to enter upon the maturity of their powers. We have the right to admit them or not, as we choose, and we are to judge whether the requirements as to population, as to intelligence, as to capacity for self-government are fulfilled; and for my part, in a proper case, I would not hesitate to exercise that power where any gross impropriety appears in the organic act.

But whilst I object to these features to which I have referred in both the New Mexico and the Arizona constitutions, I regard the so-called Flood amendment as a happy solution of the difficulty. I have faith that if there is submitted to the voters of New Mexico the single proposition whether undue restraint shall be placed upon them in the amendment of their organic act, they will determine that single question wisely, uncomplicated as it is with other general provisions of the constitution and uncomplicated as it is with anxiety as to the admission of the State. I shall expect the Territory of Arizona to decide, and I have faith that the people of that Territory will—when there is presented to them the single question whether the recall of judges shall be made under the conditions imposed by the instrument which they have framed—decide that question as we will decide it in this body—leaving to the future the framing of the recall of judges, if it should be deemed wise, uncomplicated by considerations of the power, the influence, or the popularity of a rival candidate who at the supreme moment, when the incumbent's record and character are at stake, is called upon to contest with him for the election.

I shall therefore vote for the report of the committee.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I shall take only a very few moments of the time of the Senate, and even those few moments I shall occupy with much hesitation.

The joint resolution which has been reported to the Senate by the Committee on Territories is substantially the joint resolution which passed the House of Representatives. The Committee on Territories did recommend two or three minor amendments, which I have no doubt will be adopted and which will be advantageous. The joint resolution which passed the House of Representatives and which has been reported to the Senate by the Committee on Territories does not accept either in the case of New Mexico or in the case of Arizona the constitution which the people of those States adopted. There were some minor departures from those constitutions which I will not advert to, deeming it unnecessary and at this late hour inappropriate. I will refer to one chief point of difference in relation to each Territory.

So far as New Mexico is concerned, the provision for the amendment of the constitution of that State amounts to a practical prohibition of any amendments. I will not go into a discussion of the circumstances which in all probability led to the adoption of such antiquated, cumbersome, and unreasonable provisions in relation to amendment, but simply advert to the fact that the provisions are practically a prohibition on that State of the right of amendment.

If the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is adopted, New Mexico would be admitted to the Union with a constitution containing that provision practically prohibitive of any amendment. The House joint resolution, which has been reported favorably to the Senate, objects to that provision. It does not undertake to dictate to the people of New Mexico in respect to the matter, but it does call attention to the antiquated and cumbersome provision in relation to amendment, and does require the people of New Mexico to reconsider that matter and to vote upon it again. But whether the people of New Mexico adopt the provision recommended by the House joint resolution or adhere to the recommendation contained in its original constitution, the Territory is to be admitted as a State. The Congress of the United States simply enters its protest against this unreasonable provision concerning amendments to the constitution. It asks thereto the attention of the people of New Mexico, and requires them to reconsider those provisions and to have another vote on them. But the Congress at the same time tells the people of New Mexico that whatever they determine in respect to that matter will be accepted by the Congress and the Territory will be admitted as a State.

In a similar manner I will refer to the only acute point of difference between what is recommended by the House joint resolution and the constitution of Arizona; that is, in relation to the recall of judges.

Mr. President, I adhere to the time-honored Democratic principle of States' rights. I believe that New Mexico ought to be permitted to frame her own constitution. I believe that the people of Arizona ought to be permitted to make their constitution. I am not advocating that any violent measures shall be applied to either State, but I do feel that the Congress acts wisely when it enters its protest against the recall of judges. I think the Congress acts wisely when it requires the people of Arizona to reconsider the course it adopted in the constitution it submitted in relation to the recall of judges.

There are Senators here who believe in the recall of judges. There are many other Senators who do not believe in the recall of judges. I am one of those who does not believe in the recall of judges. I do not think it a wise provision to put into a State constitution. But I recognize the right of the people in Arizona to determine that as they may see fit.

I do desire, however, that a protest shall be made against it; that we shall say to the people of Arizona we do not approve a provision for the recall of judges. I think we ought to say to them—and we do say by the House joint resolution which has been reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Territories—"we protest against this provision for the recall of judges, and we ask you to hear that question again and to reconsider it and to vote on it again." But we say at the same time that we recognize that the principle of States rights ought to be applied to a Territory asking admission as a State as well as to a State, and I see no logic or reason or right in saying that Arizona shall not insert in its constitution the same provision which has already been inserted in the constitution of the State of Oregon; I do not think it wisely inserted; but I say if the State of Arizona, after a reconsideration of this matter, after hearing the protest which the Congress makes when it fails to admit it without asking its people to consider this provision again, adheres to that provision and desires to enter the Union with a constitution containing a provision for the recall of judges, she ought to be admitted with that provision in her constitution. That is exactly what has been done by the House joint resolution which has been favorably reported to the Senate by the Committee on Territories.

I think, Mr. President, that the Committee on Territories has disposed of this whole matter justly and wisely. It leaves these questions to the determination of the respective States. I do not believe that we would gain anything by departing in any respect from the report submitted to the Senate by the Committee on Territories.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to ask whether the amendments of the committee are first in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They are. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] having offered a substitute, it is essential first, under the rules of the Senate, to act upon amendments intended to perfect the original joint resolution before the question upon the substitute is put. The pending question is the first amendment reported by the committee, which the Secretary will read.

The first amendment of the Committee on Territories was, in section 4, on page 7, line 1, after the word "voter," to strike out "at his request" and insert "and only one ballot to each elector," so as to read:

Said separate ballots shall be delivered only to the election officers authorized by law to receive and have the custody of the ballot boxes for use at said election and shall be delivered by them only to the individual voter and only one ballot to each elector at the time he offers to vote at the said general election, and shall have the initials of two election officers of opposite political parties written by them upon the back thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 7, line 7, after the word "and," to insert "if the elector desires to vote upon said amendment, the ballot," so as to read:

Said separate ballots shall not be marked either for or against the said amendment at the time it is handed to the elector by the election officer, and if the elector desires to vote upon said amendment, the ballot must be marked by the voter, unless he shall request one of the election officers to mark the same for him, in which case such election officer so called upon shall mark said ballot as such voter shall request.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 7, line 12, after the word "request," to insert:

Any elector receiving such ballot shall return the same before leaving the polls to one of the election judges, who shall immediately deposit the same in the ballot box whether such ballot be marked or not.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This completes the amendments of the committee. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I realize that it would be very improper to detain the Senate at this time, and I shall not do so. However, I feel very sure that Senators will indulge me for a moment while I say that for many years I have been the consistent and earnest friend of Arizona and

New Mexico. I have believed that they should come into the Union without further delay. Again and again I have traversed both those Territories. I am familiar with their geography, with their resources, with their recent development, and no Senator in this Chamber has a higher respect for the character of their people than myself. I greatly desire to see these Territories come into the Union now. In the language of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], whom I have no hesitation whatever in quoting, I prefer to see these States looking out of the window from the inside rather than into the window from the outside any longer. Their population, their development, their character, their resources entitle them to membership in the American sisterhood of States, and under no circumstances would I lay a single straw in the way of this accomplishment.

It has been said that the Territories have made their own constitutions in their own way, as was their right. So they have. I wish I had the time to discuss that aspect of the situation, with which we are now confronted. I had thought that I would go into the question of the power and extent to which the Federal Government may appropriately go in fixing the status of a people applying for admission into the Union. I know how far it has gone in the past, and the limitations of our power, but time forbids thorough discussion and I desist. Three times I have voted as a Member of the House of Representatives to admit these Territories as States, and I rejoice that we are upon the eve of a final settlement of this controversy, so intimately related to the welfare and happiness of these loyal and patriotic people.

But, Mr. President, with a disposition to compose differences, with the desire to get them across the threshold and into the Union, with the desire that no further obstacle may intervene to prevent them from coming in at this time, I believe it is the height of wisdom for us to so change the pending enabling act as to meet the wishes of Senators who are not satisfied with the present organic law of Arizona.

Mr. President, I do not wish to engage in controversy. I shall provoke no discussion, because there is no Senator on this floor who will go further or do more than I will do for the admission of these two Territories without further delay. But it is because I want them admitted, because I am their friend, because I do not wish them to be longer delayed, that I shall support the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota. All departments of the Federal Government must concur to make our action effective, and it is of no avail if we lead them to the precipice and imperil their security.

It is said that Arizona is unanimous for the recall of judges. I deny it. All day long I have been receiving telegrams from boards of trade, from mayors of cities, and from citizens of the Territory begging that this clause be eliminated and statehood assured. I can not pause to read the telegrams. It would not be right to those Senators who are gathered around me and who have imperative and important engagements that they must fill in a few moments. But these telegrams which I hold in my hand, from Republicans and Democrats alike, are all of the same purport and ask that the way may be made easy and certain for their prompt admission and that the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota may be adopted.

Mr. President, I would do violence to myself if I put my reason for supporting this amendment solely upon the ground of expediency; but, sir, I do not favor the recall of judges in the manner prescribed by the constitution of Arizona. I do not believe it will be helpful to accurate, well-considered, and careful judicial procedure. I think it would result in confusion and lack of stability in the law and lessen our respect for the judicial office and demoralize the administration of justice, which is the shield and reliance of the weak as well as the strong, and that it will do great harm to our country if it should generally prevail. However, I am well aware that the people of this new State may fashion their own constitution as they desire, and that their course will be beyond the reach of the Federal authority, and I am glad this is so. I do not desire to penalize them now for their action in this matter, but in order that irreconcilable differences may be composed and that no further obstacle may arise, I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota and then for the admission of both Territories. I wish time would permit the reading of the elaborate report of my brilliant and able colleague, Mr. HAMILTON, made to the House of Representatives a few years ago; his summary is so convincing and his deductions so fair that I am sure no one can traverse his report without concluding that the people of these Territories are eminently qualified for full membership in the Union, and I hope this day may find them safely there, with all the blessings and all the responsibilities we enjoy.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a clear, concise, comprehensive, conservative discussion of the initiative, referendum, and recall by Clinton W. Howard, president of the Washington State Bar Association. I should like to make it a part of this discussion by asking unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

In the formation of our present system of Government, both national and State, and under which we have grown to be the most prosperous and powerful people on the face of the globe, none rendered more efficient and patriotic service than the lawyers. That they do not possess the same influence in governmental matters at this time is due partly to the complex nature of our present civilization, which has withdrawn many of our brilliant members from the public councils to the service of private interests, often justly claimed to be in conflict with those of the public. Again, some of our profession, inspired by the lust of office, have become too prone to be regarded as leaders in movements for the time being supposedly popular, but which in the end usually result in disaster to the public welfare. Taken as a class, however, I believe that there is no body of men more devoted to their country, or who entertain a greater reverence for its institutions and laws than the lawyers.

Mindful of our country's history, and inspired by devotion to its interests, this association was formed. Among the objects of which are: To advance the science of jurisprudence, to promote the administration of justice, to secure proper legislation, to encourage a thorough legal education, to uphold the honor and dignity of the profession of law, and to cultivate and encourage cordial intercourse among the lawyers of the State of Washington.

In furtherance of some of these objects, our by-laws impose upon the president the duty, in his annual address, of reviewing statutory changes of public interest in the State.

INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM.

The last legislature submitted to the people the question whether statutory initiative and referendum shall be provided for in the organic law of the State. The act does not authorize amendments to the constitution by the initiative, but pertains to the enactment, or repeal, of statutory laws.

There is possibly no subject of current thought or legislation so much misunderstood by both the advocates and opponents thereof, as the initiative and referendum. Many of its advocates conceive the notion that this is a new and untried panacea for all the political ills which government among men is heir to. On the other hand, many of its opponents entertain the conviction that this method of legislation was first suggested in the Populist platform at the convention held in Omaha some 18 years ago.

Each is in error, as the application of the principle of the initiative and referendum is older than the history of legislation in America, is recognized, to more or less extent, in every State in the Union, and is of familiar and frequent application in the legislative history of this State.

The constitution of the State of Washington, while drafted by a convention, was not promulgated by it, but was adopted by a vote of the people. At the same election the question of woman's suffrage, Statewide prohibition, and permanent selection of the seat of government were respectively submitted to the voters for their determination. It is impossible to amend our constitution without the affirmative vote of a majority of the electors voting thereon. Nor can any convention be held to draft a new constitution without authority from the voters of the State; nor can any constitution drafted by such new convention have any force or validity until the same shall have been submitted to and adopted by the people. These respective provisions recognize to the fullest extent the principles of the initiative and referendum. Nor were these provisions incorporated into our constitution by chance, but came there advisedly and as the result of years of constitution making in America.

Many of the earlier constitutions of the different States of the Union were drafted and proclaimed by the act of constitutional conventions, which conventions were neither initiated by the people nor the work thereof ratified by a vote of the people. The first popular initiated and ratified constitution in America was that of Massachusetts, in the year 1780. In the constitutions of the New England States and some of the Southern States we first find the fullest development of the principle that in the enactment of the fundamental law the people must be consulted, both as to the propriety of having a constitution at all and of ratifying or rejecting the work of the convention which drafted the same.

Under section 6 of Article VIII of our Constitution no debt beyond a certain limit can be incurred by municipalities without the consent of three-fifths of the voters thereof, and the plan of submitting to the decision of the voters numerous questions such as pertain to the construction of schools, the changing of county seats, the incorporation of cities, the construction or purchase of municipal utilities of various kinds, local option in liquor matters, and many others that could be mentioned are of so frequent and common occurrence among us, and in many other States, as to excite little comment or attention.

TRACES HISTORY OF MOVEMENT.

Beginning with South Dakota, in 1897, the initiative and referendum has been extended to general legislation in South Dakota, Arkansas, Utah, Oregon, Missouri, Maine, Oklahoma, Colorado, Montana, and Arizona. It is advisory in Delaware. It is now before the people for enactment in California, North Dakota, Wisconsin, Idaho, Wyoming, Nebraska, and Washington. Proposals to submit it have been defeated in 10 other States. Nevada and New Mexico have the referendum.

In America this principle of control by the people is traceable to very early conditions in the history of the New England States and in some of the Southern States. It came from the old folkmoots, or town meetings, and it is well worth remembering that in many of these meetings, as well as in the guilds of England which preceded them, all qualified to belong were compelled to be members and were by fine or other appropriate penalty obliged to attend the meetings and participate in the deliberations thereof.

In 1638 the town of Portsmouth, R. I., by popular vote, enacted the following by-law, which is submitted as an example of many of like import existing in other towns:

"It is ordered that if any of the Freemen of this Body shall not repair to the publick meetings to treate upon the publick affairs of the Body upon publick warning (Whether by beate of the Drumm or otherwise) if they fayle one-quarter of an houre after the second sound, they shall forfeitt 12 pence; or if they depart without leave they are to forfeitt the same summ of 12 pence."

These assemblies were later imitated in Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Oregon, and California; in fact, in the early history of every State. They are the natural outgrowth of frontier life in remote communities separated from centralized authority.

I merely refer in the most cursory manner to the history of this subject with a view of allaying alarm on the one hand or too much eagerness on the other, to view the initiative and referendum as a new and untried principle in legislation.

It would be instructive and exceedingly interesting to trace the history of these early assemblies of the people through the period of popular enactment and ratification of laws, and the reasons for this system falling into disuse and the substitution of the delegate system therefor. To so do, however, would unduly prolong this paper, and I refer you for a comprehensive review of the entire subject to "The People's Law," by Charles Sumner Lobingier, published in 1909 by the Macmillan Co.

TRIED OUT IN ALL STATES.

There is, therefore, nothing new, novel, or alarming in the mere statement that a given State has recognized the principle of the initiative and referendum, since there is not a State in the Union that at some period of its existence has not lived under a constitution at least enacted by the referendum, excepting the State of Delaware, and that State at this time has a statutory advisory initiative and referendum.

The question, however, of immediate and paramount importance is whether or not it is wise to extend the application of this principle to the entire field of legislation or limit it in this State, as heretofore, to constitutional matters and to legislative questions as are of such general or local importance as to challenge public attention and insure sufficient interest being taken therein on behalf of the voters to which the question is submitted that a fair and impartial expression of opinion will be obtained.

While the proposed change in our constitution permits a law to be initiated on the petition of 10 per cent of the number voting for governor at the preceding election, and to be referred on like petition of 6 per cent, but in no case more than 50,000 to be required to initiate, or more than 30,000 to refer, the vote cast upon each question or measure, however, to equal one-third of the total votes cast at the election, and while it is provided that the legislature, in case the amendment be adopted, shall provide for the publicity of proposed measures, it is a grave question whether it will be the part of wisdom for the people of this State to adopt the proposed amendment. Our State not only covers a vast area, but is one of great diversity in resources, and it is but human nature for people to take little or no interest in that which is everybody's business, unless it affects them in some particular manner, so as to challenge their minute attention to the same.

VOTERS MUST SHOW INTEREST.

This condition does not prevail in matters of universal concern, such as in the ratification or rejection of a constitution or in the choosing of delegates to a State convention to frame a constitution. As stated by Ambassador Bryce, in the American Commonwealth:

"The appointment of a constitutional convention is an important event, which excites general interest in a State. Its functions are weighty and difficult, far transcending those of the regular legislature. Hence the best men in the State desire a seat in it, and, in particular, eminent lawyers become candidates, knowing how much it will affect the law they practice. It is therefore a body superior in composition to either the senate or the house of a State. Its proceedings excite more interest, its debates are more instructive, its conclusions are more carefully weighed."

But this situation is not true as to every law that may be proposed; in fact, it applies to very few of them. If some plan could be devised as in the ancient guilds and town meetings to compel every elector to go to the polls and vote, we would undoubtedly have an expression of sentiment which would represent the average wish and intelligence of the State, at least so far as it is possible for electors to advise themselves concerning matters of remote bearing and interest to their immediate community. On the other hand, this law would compel all to become actively interested in every proposed enactment or suffer the consequences of their neglect to do so.

We were told that the direct primary would result in the selection by the people of competent, impartial, and fearless advocates of their interests, and since that law is now in effect there can be consistently no claim that the people will not be fully represented by their members in the legislature.

STABILITY IS FALSE WEAKNESS.

The principal inherent vice in all initiative and referendum legislation lies in the fact that it must be adopted or rejected as proposed. It furnishes no opportunity for the interchange of ideas, which is always fruitful of a fuller and better understanding of the subject. This is the prime virtue of constitutional conventions, and the reason that the result of their labors is so generally indorsed by the people is the fact that discussion, suggestion, and mutual concession has perfected the idea which all wish to attain, but which few are competent to draft unaided by suggestion from others. The reason that a senate and house of representatives was provided, instead of one legislative body, was for the purpose of further conserving this opportunity for the interchange of ideas.

The courts have frequently held acts of the directors of private corporations void where the directors have decided upon a given course by separately agreeing thereto not in a meeting at which all or a majority were present. The reason assigned is that no opportunity was thus afforded for mutual deliberation. If this opportunity is so beneficial in the management of corporate affairs as to require action taken in the absence thereof to be held void, how much greater the necessity in applying such rule in the management of the affairs of a great State.

Another inherent vice in this method of legislation is to be found in the fact that since a measure may be enacted or defeated by a majority of the votes registered thereon it will not infrequently happen that through lack of general interest in the subject matter of the legislation the same may be enacted or defeated by less than a majority of the voters who participated in the general election, since under the proposed amendment only a majority of those voting upon the subject is required to enact or reject a law, if one-third of the votes cast in such election be registered on the measure; that is, 17 per cent of the vote may enact or reject a law.

LEGISLATION IS DELAYED.

Under the proposed amendment no act, law, or bill, excepting such as may be necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, or safety, support of the State government and its existing public institutions, shall take effect until 90 days after the adjournment of the session at which it is enacted. This, except as to the matters mentioned, deprives the legislature of putting any law into immediate force, regardless of the emergency existing therefor. But that is not all; regardless of the emergency and necessity for the act and irrespective of whether it may have been enacted in response to an overwhelming demand by the people therefor, it is within the power of a small minority, consisting of only 6 per cent of the vote cast for governor, to hold up such law without other act than the filing of a referendum petition. Unless a special session of the legislature is called to submit such law to a special election of the people the State can thus be deprived of the benefit of such enactment for a period approximating 20 months, and that, too, notwithstanding that at such election it may be approved by an overwhelming majority of the voters of the State. The experience of the University of Oregon on two separate occasions illustrates the entire probability of meritorious measures thus being held up.

In Oregon the constitution may be amended by a vote on initiative petition the same as statutory law may be enacted. As this State has had the widest experience of any in this species of legislation, you will be interested in and instructed by reading the address of Hon. Frederick V. Holman, late president of the Oregon Bar Association, delivered at its annual meeting November 15, 1910, at Portland, Oreg., and also his address on "Results in Oregon," delivered February 4, 1911, at the Civic Federation of Chicago banquet. Mr. Holman treats the entire subject from a lawyer's standpoint, and his observations and conclusions should be carefully read by every voter in this State. The closing paragraph of his latter address is as follows:

"Briefly, to summarize, then, we find that the so-called 'reserve' power is greatly abused; that measures in overwhelming numbers and many of them loosely drawn, are being put upon the ballot; that the percentage of those who do not participate in direct legislation is increasing; that lack of intelligent grasp of many measures is clearly indicated; that legislation is being enacted by minorities to the prejudice of the best interests of the majority; and that the constitution itself is being freely changed with reckless disregard of its purpose and character."

The recent history of constitution making in Mississippi, South Carolina, Delaware, Louisiana, Kentucky, and Virginia illustrates the wisdom of proceeding cautiously in the matter of the enactment of laws by universal franchise. While each of the States last mentioned, with the exception of Delaware, had, until recent years, constitutions enacted by the vote of the people of the State, conditions have arisen which impelled the people of these States to reverse their political history and to return to the system of framing and promulgating constitutions by the act of constitutional conventions, without submission of the same for ratification to the vote of the people. This may be clearly styled a retrogression from the principle of popular government by the people. Whatever the peculiar local conditions there may have been which induced the people of these States to this course, the fact that they felt obliged to take such course is a sufficient warning that the abuse of power by ignorance, indifference, or whatever other reason may be assigned, is possible under unlimited participation in lawmaking.

DEMAND IS UNWARRANTED.

The present agitation for a return to the ancient and discarded principle of the enactment of statutory law by a vote of the people finds no basis or justification in the recent political history of this State. I know of no popular demand for legislation of any character, excepting the reapportionment bill, that has not found a ready response from the legislature of the State, and under the primary system of nominating members to that body I can see no excuse for any contention that it will not in the future continue to represent the wishes of the people.

It was attempted at the last session of the legislature to meet the requirements of the constitution by making a new apportionment as to senators and representatives. It being impossible to agree upon a measure none was passed. We might as well be frank among ourselves and concede the real reason for the failure of the passage of any such measure. The large centers of population were anxious for the passage of such a law, for the reason that it would result in giving them greater local representation in one or both bodies of the legislature. The more sparsely settled portions of the State were opposed to the passage of such a law, because it would correspondingly reduce their existing legislative influence. Now, the strange inconsistency in this matter is this: The sparsely settled communities whose representation by the reapportionment would be correspondingly reduced in legislative influence were opposing the apportionment bill for this reason; while, on the other hand, they were favoring the initiative and referendum measures, which would work exactly to the same end as the reapportionment. As the matter now stands the agricultural counties of eastern Washington have much greater proportionate influence in the legislature, through their representatives, than they will have if the legislative equation is transformed to the electoral vote of the State, and I predict now that if the initiative and referendum amendment is adopted and used to any considerable extent it will result in the control of the State going to a combination of voters in the large cities, to the ignoring of the wishes of the agricultural communities.

WOMAN-SUFFRAGE MATTER.

The legislature of 1909 submitted, and at the election in 1910 the people ratified, an amendment to our constitution granting to women the right of suffrage. It might be the part of wisdom to give these newly enfranchised electors a little experience in voting for candidates before imposing upon them the additional onerous duty of directly participating in the enactment or rejection of the statutory law of the State.

SHORT-BALLOT MOVEMENT.

In the last year and a half there has arisen an organization known as the "Short-Ballot Organization," with which the so-called reform movement is in full accord. The "short-ballot" principle is defined by this organization, as printed in the January, 1911, issue of Equity (a publication devoted to direct-legislation record, the referendum news, and the proportional representation review), as follows:

"The dangerously great power of politicians in our country is not due to any particular civic indifference of the people, but rests on the fact that we are living under a form of democracy that is so unworkable as to constitute, in practice, a pseudodemocracy. It is unworkable because—

"First. It submits to popular election offices which are too unimportant to attract (or deserve) public attention;

"Second. It submits to popular election so many offices at one time that many of them are inevitably crowded out from proper public attention; and

"Third. It submits to popular election so many offices at one time that the business of making up the elaborate tickets necessary at every election makes the political machine an indispensable instrument in electoral action.

"Many officials, therefore, are elected without adequate public scrutiny and owe their selection not to the people, but to the makers of the party ticket, who thus acquire an influence that is capable of great abuse.

"The 'short-ballot' principle is:

"First. That only those offices should be elective which are important enough to attract (and deserve) public examination.

"Second. That very few offices should be filled by election at one time, so as to permit adequate and unconfused public examination of the candidates."

It is difficult to comprehend why each proposition above outlined is not applicable to the initiative and referendum in statutory matters. Laws too unimportant to attract or deserve public attention may be so submitted. It is entirely possible and probable that so many laws may be submitted at one time that many of them will inevitably be crowded out from proper public attention, so that many laws may be thus enacted without adequate public scrutiny and owe their enactment not to the people but to the makers and framers of such laws, who thus acquire a legislative influence that is capable of great abuse. If we are to draw any analogy from the suggestions of this organization, it is that only matters of a constitutional nature or those sufficiently important to attract and deserve public examination, such as are already provided for in the laws of this State, should be subject to initiative and referendum control, and that only such few important measures should be submitted at one time as to permit of adequate and unconfused public examination of the same. It must everywhere be conceded that the vote for candidates is larger than for measures submitted at the same election. Hence any reasons calling for restrictions on voting for candidates must apply with even greater force to voting upon measures.

The last Federal census gave the State of Washington the largest percentage of increase in population of any State in the Union. While undoubtedly its climate and resources vastly contributed to this influx of population, the wisdom and stability of its laws helped in no small degree. The constitution under which we have existed, with few amendments, for nearly 22 years was adopted by a vote of the people after a convention of able men had in a painstaking manner carefully considered its various provisions. Now, since the recent legislative history of this State does not show a disregard of the will of the people, as reflected in legislative enactment, and since many conservative people and investors view with alarm the tendency of certain Western States to adopt what they are pleased to call freak legislation, it is well worth the serious consideration of all of the voters of the State whether it would not be to our material advancement as a State if we should, by our votes upon the proposed amendment to the constitution, decline to adopt the initiative and referendum at this time, or at least in its present form, and until some corollary legislation shall be proposed which shall prevent the abuse to which the proposed change is at present susceptible, and until the electorate of the State is required by law, as in the ancient guilds and town meetings, to attend upon and participate in all proposed initiative and referendum legislation.

COMMISSION GOVERNMENT.

In apparent contrast to the democratic tendency of control by the people is the act authorizing cities containing 2,500 and less than 20,000 inhabitants to organize under what is known as the commission form of government. Its principles are now too generally understood to justify comment, further than to say that its main object is apparently to consolidate power and authority, including that of the appointment of all subordinate municipal officers, in the hands of three men—a mayor and two commissioners. However, the initiative, referendum, and recall are expressly provided for, and franchises for most all public utilities, excepting steam railroads, must be authorized by a majority of the electors voting thereon at a general or special election. It might be well to postpone the incorporation into our constitution of the initiative, referendum, and recall in State matters pending the observation of its operation in local affairs, since as to the latter, should the same prove to be detrimental to the development of the municipalities of the State, the same can be changed by the legislature.

Chapter 17 of the acts of the last session was introduced and passed to cover a local situation alleged to exist in Spokane. The object claimed for it was to authorize that city to adopt the commission form of government. The act is properly applicable only to cities of the first class. Among other things, it purports to validate the inclusion in such charters of the initiative, referendum, and recall. Under the subsequent decision in Walker v. City of Spokane, the act proved to be unnecessary. Its phraseology, however, is such as to leave possible room for the contention that the legislature intended to make operative some charter provisions theretofore invalid by reason of conflict with statutory enactment or for want of the same. Whether the legislature attempted to or could under our constitution and in this manner relieve such cities of existing legislation inconsistent with their charters present some interesting questions that should be determined at an early date. Fortunately under our constitution no such permanent and irreconcilable conflict between State and municipal control can arise as prevails in Oregon, which conflict in that State is so concisely pointed out by Mr. Holman in his address before the State Bar Association.

RECALL AMENDMENT.

The last legislature also proposed an amendment to the constitution to be voted upon in the November, 1912, election, providing for the recall of all elective officers, excepting judges. The exception is the only merit contained in the proposed amendment. The experience of some of our cities with this freak species of legislation has already made them the laughing stock of the country. A public officer should have the courage of his convictions, but in these days of vicious misrepresentation by the partisan press there is no official, however, upright and honorable in the discharge of his duties, who is not subject to the whims and caprices of a minority of his representatives and liable at any time, at great expense and inconvenience to himself and to the public, to be called upon to defend his title to the office. Few men are ever elected to public office without there being cast against them in such election a greater percentage of the vote than is required to compel such officer to contest again for the office to which he has been elected, by the initiation of a recall election under the proposed amendment; all of which can have but one effect, namely, to induce the agitator and demagogue to run for office, while deterring men of character and ability from offering their services to the public. Our laws already make ample provision for the removal from office of unfaithful public officials; the method, however, usually requiring some opportunity to appear and be heard, which principle of our law is the very keystone to the protection of life, liberty, property, and reputation. The proposed amendment is a clear reversion to the democratic days of ancient Greece, when the populists, inspired by the orator of the day, tried, adjudged, and sentenced, exercising on the spur of the moment those functions which the wisdom of ages has established should be divided into executive, legislative, and judicial departments.

LINCOLN WOULD HAVE FALLEN.

The Hon. Charles G. Dawes, late Comptroller of the Currency, in a recent address, viewed this subject in the light of history, in words so forcefully applicable to the subject under consideration that I have taken the liberty to quote him at some length. During the course of his remarks he said:

"Suppose we had had this power of recall vested in the people of the United States when Abraham Lincoln stood against the voice of the radical and the voice of the aggressive and against the clamor of the unthinking, against the thousands of those demanding that he take immediate action on this or that question, and that in consequence he had been compelled either to be precipitate in some of those issues upon which hung the safety of this Republic or to abandon the helm of the struggling ship of state.

"Every great man in our history whose memory the people love and revere has had at one time to stand against what was the immediate positive popular demand for action, and it was because he stood against the demand that we to-day look upon him as great.

"The men who stand as the beacon lights in American history were not the men who were always at the head of every popular movement among the people of the United States, and if this country is to endure this kind of a man, in the future of our country as much if not more than in the past, must have his opportunity to stand by his policy amidst the clamor of the majority against him at the time being. * * *

"Suppose that there had been the right of recall among the soldiers of the Army of the Potomac during the Battle of the Wilderness! Suppose that Gen. Grant had not had the chance to work out his policy! Suppose that Grant had not had the chance to save this Government! My friends, in government as in war, before an Appomattox we can not always avoid a Wilderness.

"We have had instances where popular clamor had its way. This country even yet does not forget the humiliation it suffered at the beginning of the Civil War, when the time which was being taken by wise men for the preparation of the forces of the North was too long for the impatience of a people bent on action; and we had the cry, "On to Richmond!" and a brave Army was sent to battle, contrary to sound judgment, in response to an overpowering demand of a people who were not informed of the real situation, and as a result came the crushing, bitter, terrible humiliation of Bull Run.

"Do not make of your Republic a Bull Run. I saw President McKinley at the beginning of the Spanish War, when he put in jeopardy his leadership of his party and of his people in his endeavor to avert the war as well as to obtain time for adequate military preparation, and an almost overwhelming demand came from the people for immediate action; but his firmness in not yielding to it, gentlemen, is his true claim upon fame."

SUPREME COURT JUDGES TOUT FOR VOTES.

The last legislature, in my judgment, enacted an unwise measure when it restored to the direct primary the nomination of supreme court judges. This method was in use a few years since, and under it three judges were elected to the supreme bench. There were numerous candidates, and it was indeed a pitiful sight to see them gumshoeing up and down the State looking after votes like a ward politician. The life which judges lead separates them from the people. They practically become recluses, and few excepting attorneys know the nature or extent of their vastly important service to the State or are able to judge of the ability and character of their work. I believe that the great majority of the people of this State want to vote right on the question of the election of supreme court judges, and that they would frankly admit what everyone excepting members of the legislature knows to be the fact—that not 5 per cent of the voters of the State know who the supreme judges are or what terms are next to become vacant, and are only too anxious to have some responsible body set its seal of approval upon the nominees for this office. This was amply demonstrated in the last election, when the nominees of the Republican Tacoma convention were elected by very large majorities, and that, too, in the face of repeated misrepresentation and abuse. Supreme court judges should either be appointed by the governor or elected by the people upon nomination by a nonpartisan convention, as recommended by resolution of this association, passed at its last meeting, which resolution is as follows:

"We favor an absolutely nonpartisan judiciary and to that end recommend that the statutes be so amended as to provide for the nomination of all judges, by judicial conventions, composed of delegates elected by the whole people for that purpose only, and that no other business shall be transacted by such convention than to nominate judges, the judges so nominated to be elected at the general elections."

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION.

At the last session a workmen's compensation act was enacted which, for protection to the employee, finds no parallel in the history of any other State in the Union. That some such law should have been enacted is conceded by all right-thinking men. The law, as framed and originally introduced, and which in response to a popular wave would possibly have been enacted by an initiative vote had we such system in force at the time, was clearly unconstitutional. It was later amended by its friends, but only after the benefit of conference, discussion, and committee work had brought out and developed the bill in all its phases. In view of the fact that the validity of this act is now pending before the supreme court of the State, it would be highly improper for me at this time to comment upon its various provisions. Suffice to say, that sooner or later some valid, fair, honest, and impartial law covering this subject will be enacted in this State, and I predict that such result is much more likely to be accomplished by the combined wisdom of the legislature, after full consideration and discussion, than by the vote of the people of the State for or against a particular bill and as submitted with no opportunity of amendment.

PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION.

The last legislature substituted for the railroad commission a public utilities commission, and vastly enlarged its powers, bringing under its jurisdiction, in addition to railroads, telegraph, telephone, and warehouse companies theretofore under the jurisdiction of the railroad commission, the various electric-light, power, street-car, gas, and water companies in the State and to a limited extent the municipally owned utilities. The bill as originally drawn assumed the same jurisdiction of the municipally owned utilities as of those of private companies. The municipalities of the State, however, following the deplorable example of those of Great Britain—whose course has done more to retard the development of street and interurban railways, electric-light and gas plants in Great Britain than any other single factor—succeeded in inducing the legislature to relieve them largely from the operation of the act. The main justification for acts of this character is that the State, through its proper commission, may stand between the producer of a commodity and the consumer thereof, to the end that the best and most efficient product may be furnished to the consumer under the most reasonable circumstances and price. There is no well-founded reason why this principle is not applicable to municipally owned plants the same as private ones.

However, municipalities are required to keep the same system of books, to publish their rates, and to change them only upon notice to the commission, as are privately owned utilities. A faithful compliance with this act will soon result in advising the citizens of a given municipality whether their public utilities are self-supporting and an asset of the city, or are running at a loss and in part, at least, maintained from general taxation.

The State of Wisconsin, which is conceded to be fairly progressive in its legislation, recognizes the principle of a legalized monopoly in public utilities; that is, if there is a privately owned plant or a municipally owned plant (each of which is under like control by the commission) already doing business in any community, neither the city can engage in, nor any citizen or corporation can obtain a franchise to engage in, a like business in that community without first obtaining from the railroad commission of the State an order of public necessity and convenience, the theory being that the commission will require the existing utility, whether publicly or privately owned, to take care of the public in an efficient manner and at a reasonable cost and not impose upon it the burden of maintaining several plants of the same character, since history has shown that sooner or later they are consolidated, and much needless equipment eliminated, and the cost thereof is uniformly urged to be taken into consideration in fixing the rate of return to be earned by the consolidated enterprise.

GOVERNMENT BY SENTIMENT.

This State, to its everlasting disadvantage, is to-day reaping the disastrous results of government by sentiment and hysteria instead of by law. The school and other public lands to which it is justly entitled are being withheld on one pretext and another until approximately one-third of the area of the State is embraced in so-called forest and other reserves. In the older States of the East, South, and Middle West, villages, towns, and cities have everywhere grown up around the waterfalls and power sites of its rivers and streams. The opportunity of like development here has been denied to the people of this State, and primarily, if not indeed exclusively, justified upon the plea that it is essential for the Federal Government to pursue this course in order to protect present and future generations from the control of grasping water-power monopolies.

The utter baselessness of such a plea is shown by the opinion of the supreme court of this State in the case of Tacoma v. Nisqually Power Co. (57 Wash., 420). The point in this case to which I particularly refer is the holding that the public, in this case represented by a municipal corporation, has the paramount right by eminent domain to appropriate to its own use, and that of the public which it represents, a privately owned water-power site and plant, notwithstanding that the same be at the time employed and engaged in a public-service capacity. This being the law of this State, how can it ever be claimed that there is any justification for the contention, repeatedly reiterated on the part of the Federal Government's policy, that it is necessary to withdraw from use vast water-power sites of this State, and to permit their development only under such regulations as Congress may prescribe in order to prevent the absorption of the same and a monopoly to the detriment of the public. In addition to this most every use to which a water power in this day can be economically devoted would result in its falling within the jurisdiction of the public-utility commission of the State, which has ample power to protect the people against extortion or any of the consequences so recklessly predicted by the so-called conservationists.

The by-laws do not contemplate a review of Federal laws by the President, but provide for a report from the committee on Federal legislation, of which Judge Hanford is chairman. I shall therefore make no further reference to such legislation, as it will be fully covered in a much more comprehensive and able manner by the chairman of such committee.

GOVERNMENT OF LAWS.

Our present system was designed to and has established a government not of men but of laws. The constitution adopted by the people, with its coordinate branches of government, was intended to operate as a check and a restraint upon each department and upon the people themselves. It established a representative form of government, with definite tenure of office, and, as if in prophetic anticipation of the present movement for return to government by a pure democracy, provided in article 1, section 32, that "a frequent recurrence to fundamental principles is essential to the security of individual rights and the perpetuity of free government."

The proposed initiative and referendum amendment denies to the executive the veto power as to laws so enacted. This power has seldom, if ever, been abused in this State, but, on the contrary, has often been the means of preventing unwise and sometimes vicious legislation. While this particular amendment applies only to statutory enactment, leaving such statutes like those passed by the legislature subject to existing constitutional limitations and judicial interpretation, it can not be denied that the ultimate object of its authors and other advocates of the direct legislative movement is to establish the principle that all power, legislative, executive, and judicial, shall be exercised by the unrestrained will of the majority. However, the plan submitted here, like that in other States, does not even possess the merit of being consistent with this claim of majority rule, since under it minorities may control, as, in fact, they are doing in Oregon and elsewhere in many matters submitted.

The deliberate judgment of the people may always be relied upon. Not every expression of popular will, however, is what the people themselves wish when they have had opportunity and time for reflection. Too often in our history have agitators attempted to commit the people to unwise measures by displaying banners, which to the public view read "For reform," but on the back of which can usually be found the label, "Candidate for office."

LAWYERS ARE LIGHTHOUSE KEEPERS.

Lawyers, of all others, should be the lighthouse keepers; to see to it that the channel is marked, the reefs and shoals indicated, so that the ship of state may safely proceed upon her course, freighted as she is with the life, liberty, property, and reputation of her citizens. It therefore becomes our public duty to examine and weigh carefully these measures which the last legislature has submitted to the people of the State for ratification or rejection at the November, 1912, general election.

At no time in the history of the State as now is such an opportunity afforded and obligation imposed upon the lawyers to give to their fellow citizens wise and impartial counsel on these matters of grave public concern. It is our sworn duty to lay aside every motive of private interest and, with a view solely to the public good, resume the place in the public confidence and council which our predecessors occupied in the formation of our Government. In the discharge of this duty we may be publicly abused and our motives misrepresented. It may then be a help and inspiration to recall the words of James Otis in his memorable address delivered in Boston in 1761 in opposition to "writs of assistance":

"The only principles of public conduct that are worthy of a gentleman or a man are to sacrifice estate, ease, health, and applause, and even life, to the sacred calls of his country. These manly sentiments in private life make the good citizen, in public life the patriot and the hero."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. NELSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment submitted by me.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (when his name was called). On this amendment I am paired with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]. He being absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], and vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] upon all votes during the present legislative day. On this question I vote "yea."

Mr. BURNHAM (when Mr. GALLINGER's name was called). My colleague [Mr. GALLINGER] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. OWEN (when Mr. GORE's name was called). I announce that my colleague [Mr. GORE] is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN].

Mr. CLAPP (when Mr. GRONNA's name was called). The junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber. He is paired with the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]. If present, the Senator from North Dakota would vote "nay."

Mr. SHIVELY (when Mr. KERN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. KERN] is unavoidably absent from the city. If he were present, he would vote "nay." He is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT].

Mr. CRANE (when Mr. LODGE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. LODGE] is detained from the Senate. He is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea" on this proposition.

Mr. NELSON (when Mr. MCCUMBER's name was called). The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. If the Senator from North Dakota were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when Mr. PERCY's name was called). My colleague [Mr. PERCY] is paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). On the pending amendment I am paired with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. He is absent on account of sickness in his family. If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when Mr. RAYNER's name was called). My colleague [Mr. RAYNER] is paired with the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

Mr. CURTIS (when the name of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina was called). I was requested to announce that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. SMOOT (when Mr. SUTHERLAND's name was called). My colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. He has a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TAYLOR. My colleague [Mr. LEA] is absent from the city on account of illness in his family.

Mr. MYERS. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. This announcement will stand for the day.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 43, as follows:

YEAS—26.

Bradley	Curtis	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Briggs	Dillingham	Nixon	Smoot
Burnham	Gamble	O'Gorman	Stephenson
Clark, Wyo.	Guggenheim	Oliver	Warren
Crane	Heyburn	Page	Wetmore

So Mr. NELSON'S amendment was rejected.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. BAILEY. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], and vote "yea."

Mr. BURNHAM (when Mr. GALLINGER'S name was called). I desire to make the same announcement in reference to my colleague [Mr. GALLINGER] as I made on the previous roll call.

Mr. OWEN (when Mr. GORE'S name was called). I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. GORE] is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN].

Mr. CLAPP (when Mr. GRONNA'S name was called). I make the same announcement again for the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] as on the previous roll call. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when Mr. PERCY'S name was called). I wish to repeat the announcement I have previously made. My colleague [Mr. PERCY] is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. If my colleague were present, he would "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CRANE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. LODGE] is necessarily detained from the Senate. He is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. CLAPP. On behalf of the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] I desire to state that he is unavoidably detained from the Senate. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 53, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—53.

So the joint resolution was passed. It is as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona are hereby admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, in accordance with the terms of the enabling act approved June 20, 1910, upon the terms and conditions hereinafter set forth. The admission herein provided for shall take effect upon the proclamation of the President of the United States, when the conditions explicitly set forth in this joint resolution shall have been complied with, which proclamation shall issue at the earliest practicable time after the results of the election herein provided for shall have been certified to the President, and also after evidence shall have been submitted to him of the compliance with the terms and conditions of this resolution.

The President is authorized and directed to certify the adoption of this resolution to the governor of each Territory as soon as practicable after the adoption hereof, and each of said governors shall issue his proclamation for the holding of the first general election as provided for in the constitution of New Mexico heretofore adopted and the election ordinance No. 2 adopted by the constitutional convention of Arizona, respectively, and for the submission to a vote of the electors of said Territories of the amendments of the constitutions of said proposed States, respectively, herein set forth in accordance with the terms and conditions of this joint resolution. The results of said elections shall be certified to the President by the governor of each of said Territories; and if the terms and conditions of this joint resolution shall have been complied with, the proclamation shall immediately issue by the President announcing the result of said elections so ascertained, and upon the issuance of said proclamation the proposed State or States so complying shall be deemed admitted by Congress into the Union upon an equal footing with the other States.

SEC. 2. That the admission of New Mexico shall be subject to the terms and conditions of a joint resolution approved February 16, 1911, and entitled "Joint resolution reaffirming the boundary line between Texas and the Territory of New Mexico."

SEC. 3. That before the proclamation of the President shall issue announcing the result of said election in New Mexico, and at the same time that the State election aforesaid is held, the electors of New Mexico shall vote upon the following proposed amendment of their State constitution as a condition precedent to the admission of said State, to wit:

"Article 19 of the constitution, as adopted by the electors of New Mexico at an election held on the 21st day of January, A. D. 1911, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"'ARTICLE 19.

"'AMENDMENT.

"'SECTION 1. Any amendment or amendments to this constitution may be proposed in either house of the legislature at any regular session thereof; and if a majority of all members elected to each of the two houses voting separately shall vote in favor thereof, such proposed amendment or amendments shall be entered on their respective journals with the yeas and nays thereon.

"'The secretary of state shall cause any such amendment or amendments to be published in at least one newspaper in every county of the State, where a newspaper is published once each week, for four consecutive weeks, in English and Spanish when newspapers in both of said languages are published in such counties, the last publication to be not more than two weeks prior to the election at which time said amendment or amendments shall be submitted to the electors of the State for their approval or rejection; and the said amendment or amendments shall be voted upon at the next regular election held in said State after the adjournment of the legislature proposing such amendment or amendments, or at such special election to be held not less than six months after the adjournment of said legislature, at such time as said legislature may by law provide. If the same be ratified by a majority of the electors voting thereon, such amendment or amendments shall become part of this constitution. If two or more amendments are proposed, they shall be so submitted as to enable the electors to vote on each of them separately: Provided, That no amendment shall apply to or affect the provisions of sections 1 and 3 of article 7 hereof, on elective franchise, and sections 8 and 10 of article 12 hereof, on education, unless it be proposed by vote of three-fourths of the members elected to each house and be ratified by a vote of the people of this State in an election at which at least three-fourths of the electors voting in the whole State and at least two-thirds of those voting in each county in the State shall vote for such amendment.

"'SEC. 2. Whenever, during the first 25 years after the adoption of this constitution, the legislature, by a three-fourths vote of the members elected to each house, or, after the expiration of said period of 25 years, by a two-thirds vote of the members elected to each house, shall deem it necessary to call a convention to revise or amend this constitution, they shall submit the question of calling such convention to the electors at the next general election, and if a majority of all the electors voting on such question at said election in the State shall vote in favor of calling a convention the legislature shall, at the next session, provide by law for calling the same. Such convention shall consist of at least as many delegates as there are members of the house of representatives. The constitution adopted by such convention shall have no validity until it has been submitted to and ratified by the people.

"'SEC. 3. If this constitution be in any way so amended as to allow laws to be enacted by direct vote of the electors the laws which may be so enacted shall be only such as might be enacted by the legislature under the provisions of this constitution.

"'SEC. 4. When the United States shall consent thereto, the legislature, by a majority vote of the members in each house, may submit to the people the question of amending any provision of article 21 of this constitution on compact with the United States to the extent allowed by the act of Congress permitting the same, and if a majority of the qualified electors who vote upon any such amendment shall vote in favor thereof the said article shall be thereby amended accordingly.

"'SEC. 5. The provisions of section 1 of this article shall not be changed, altered, or abrogated in any manner except through a general convention called to revise this constitution as herein provided.'"

SEC. 4. That the probate clerks of the several counties of New Mexico shall provide separate ballots for the use of the electors at said first State election for the purpose of voting upon said amendment. Said separate ballots shall be printed on paper of a blue tint, so that they may be readily distinguished from the white ballots provided for the election of county and State officers. Said separate ballots shall be delivered only to the election officers authorized by law to receive and have the custody of the ballot boxes for use at said election and shall be delivered by them only to the individual voter and only one ballot to each elector at the time he offers to vote at the said general election, and shall have the initials of two election officers of opposite political parties written by them upon the back thereof. Said separate ballots shall not be marked either for or against the said amendment at the time it is handed to the elector by the election officer, and if the elector desires to vote upon said amendment, the ballot must be marked by the voter, unless he shall request one of the election officers to mark the same for him, in which case such election officer so called upon shall mark said ballot as such voter shall request. Any elector receiving such ballot shall return the same before leaving the polls to one of the election judges, who shall immediately deposit the same in the ballot box, whether such ballot be marked or not. No ballots on said amendment except those so handed to said electors and so initialed shall be deposited in the ballot box or counted or canvassed. Said separate ballots shall have printed thereon the proposed amendment in both the English and the Spanish language. There shall be placed on said ballots two blank squares with dimensions of one-half an inch and opposite one of said squares shall be printed in both the English and the Spanish language the words "For constitutional amendment," and opposite the other blank square shall be printed in both the English and Spanish language the words "Against constitutional amendment."

Any elector desiring to vote for said amendment shall mark his ballot with a cross in the blank square opposite the words "For constitutional amendment," or cause the same to be so marked by an election officer as aforesaid, and any elector desiring to vote against said amendment shall mark his ballot with a cross in the blank square opposite the words "Against constitutional amendment," or cause the same to be so marked by an election officer as aforesaid.

SEC. 5. That said ballots shall be counted and canvassed by said election officers, and the returns of said election upon said amendment shall be made by said election officers direct to the secretary of the Territory of New Mexico at Santa Fe, who, with the governor and chief justice of said Territory, shall constitute a canvassing board; and they, or any two of them, shall meet at said city of Santa Fe on the third Monday after said election and shall canvass the same. If a majority of the legal votes cast at said election upon said amendment shall be in favor thereof, the said canvassing board shall forthwith certify said result to the governor of the Territory, together with the statement of votes cast upon the question of the ratification or rejection of said amendment; whereupon the governor of said Territory shall by proclamation declare the said amendment a part of the constitution of the proposed State of New Mexico, and thereupon the same shall become and be a part of said constitution; but if the same shall fail of such majority, then article 19 of the constitution of New Mexico as adopted on January 21, 1911, shall remain a part of said constitution.

Except as herein otherwise provided, said election upon this amendment shall be in all respects subject to the election laws of New Mexico now in force.

SEC. 6. That the fifth clause of section 2 of "An act to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of Arizona to form a constitution and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved June 20, A. D. 1910, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"Fifth. That said State shall never enact any law restricting or abridging the right of suffrage on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

SEC. 7. That before the proclamation of the President shall issue, announcing the result of said election in Arizona, and at the same time that the State election is held, as aforesaid, the electors of Arizona shall vote upon the following proposed amendment to their State constitution as a condition precedent to the admission of said State, to wit:

"Section 1 of article 8 of the constitution of the State of Arizona, adopted by the electors of said State at an election held on the 9th day of February, A. D. 1911, be, and the same is hereby, amended, so as to read as follows:

"'ARTICLE 8.—REMOVAL FROM OFFICE.

"'1. RECALL OF PUBLIC OFFICERS.

"'SECTION 1. Every public officer in the State of Arizona, except members of the judiciary, holding an elective office, either by election or appointment, is subject to recall from such office by the qualified electors of the electoral district from which candidates are elected to such office. Such electoral district may include the whole State. Such number of said electors as shall equal 25 per cent of the number of votes cast at the last preceding general election for all of the candidates for the office held by such officer may, by petition, which shall be known as a recall petition, demand his recall.'"

The ballots to be provided for said first State election shall have printed thereon this proposed amendment and there shall be placed on said ballots two blank squares with dimensions of one-half an inch and opposite one of said squares shall be printed the words "For constitutional amendment" and opposite the other blank square shall be printed the words "Against constitutional amendment."

Any elector desiring to vote for said amendment shall place a cross in the blank square opposite the words "For constitutional amendment," and those desiring to vote against such amendment shall place a cross in the blank square opposite the words "Against constitutional amendment," and said ballots shall be counted and canvassed by the election officers of said State authorized by law to count and canvass the ballots cast at the election for State officers; and the returns of said election upon said amendment shall be made by said election officers direct to the secretary of the Territory of Arizona at Phoenix, who, with the governor and chief justice of said Territory, shall constitute a canvassing board, and they, or any two of them, shall meet at said city of Phoenix on the third Monday after said election and shall canvass the same. If a majority of the legal votes cast at said election upon said amendment shall be in favor thereof, the said canvassing board shall forthwith certify said result to the governor of the Territory, together with the statement of votes cast upon the question of the ratification or rejection of said amendment; whereupon the governor of said Territory shall, by proclamation, declare the said amendment a part of the constitution of the proposed State of Arizona, and thereupon the same shall become and be a part of said constitution; but if the same shall fail of such majority, then section 1 of article 8 of the constitution of Arizona, as adopted on February 9, 1911, shall remain a part of said constitution.

Except as herein otherwise provided said election upon this amendment shall be in all respects, except as to the educational qualification of electors, subject to the election laws of Arizona now in force.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 3) providing for the printing of 17,100 copies of the proceedings upon the unveiling of the statue of Baron von Steuben in Washington, D. C., December 7, 1910, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 2925. An act to extend the privileges of the act approved June 10, 1880, to the port of Brownsville, Tex.;

H. R. 6098. An act to authorize the Campbell Lumber Co. to construct a bridge across the St. Francis River from a point in Dunklin County, Mo., to a point in Clay County, Ark.;

H. R. 6747. An act to reenact an act authorizing the construction of a bridge across St. Croix River, and to extend the time for commencing and completing the said structure;

H. R. 7693. An act to authorize the town of Logan, Aitkin County, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in Aitkin County, Minn.;

H. R. 12051. An act for the relief of the city of Crawford, in the State of Nebraska, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 7 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Wednesday, August 9, 1911, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, August 8, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., as follows:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee for the light of this new day, with its splendid opportunities to expand our minds and enrich our lives by a faithful and conscientious service to Thee and our fellow men. Inspire us to do this in the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of August 7, 1911, was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 1149. An act permitting the Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie Railway Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge across the St. Croix River between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota;

S. 2732. An act to authorize the Providence, Warren & Bristol Railroad Co. and its lessee, the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., or either of them, to construct a bridge across the Palmers, or Warren, River, in the State of Rhode Island; and

S. 2768. An act to authorize the St. Louis-Kansas City Electric Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the town of Weldon Springs Landing, Mo.

CORRECTING ERRORS IN ENROLLMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on House joint resolution No. 1, to correct errors in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up the conference report on House joint resolution No. 1 and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The conference report (No. 132) is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 1) to correct errors in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2 and 3.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate amending the title of the joint resolution, and agree to the same.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
A. S. BURLESON,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

F. E. WARREN,
GEO. C. PERKINS,
MURPHY J. FOSTER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the House joint resolution No. 1 to correct errors in the enrollment of certain appropriation bills approved March 4, 1911, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and submitted in the accompanying conference report, namely:

It is recommended that the two amendments of the Senate striking out the preamble of the resolution and amending the title thereof be agreed to, and that the Senate recede from its two amendments striking out the provision reimbursing the University of Idaho the sum of $500 and the provision repealing that part of the naval appropriation act approved March 4 last, having reference to partial payments to builders of naval vessels.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
A. S. BURLESON,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for one hour.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 50 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety-nine Members present—a quorum. The gentleman from Florida is recognized.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, in the extreme south of this great Union of sovereign States, between the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic Ocean, lies Florida, the fairest flower in the garden of statehood. [Applause.] Her balmy climate, her healthful ocean breezes, her delicious tropical fruits, her wonderful palm trees, her tall pines, her majestic oaks, her silvery lakes, her wonderful rivers, and her youth-preserving springs have made Florida famous throughout the civilized world. [Applause.] Nowhere in all the habitable globe does the sun shine with such resplendent glory as in Florida; no painter's brush can transfer to canvas the ravishing beauty of a moonlight night in Florida; no pen can picture, nor can any imagination conceive the transcendent beauty of her landscape, the fertility of her soil, the luxuriance of her tropical fruits and flowers, the rich perfume of which is borne in riotous profusion on every passing breeze.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; I can not, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Nearly 400 years ago the bold Spanish navigator, Ponce de Leon, landed on Florida's shores in search of the fabled "Fountain of youth," and thus, although failing himself, opened the way for the many thousands who came after him and found long life and supreme happiness in that goodly land.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman's remarks are not in order, because he is not discussing the subject before the House. I would be willing for the gentleman to have time, by unanimous consent, so far as I am concerned, but I would like to have a ruling from the Chair as to whether the gentleman can discuss some other matter——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I think, Mr. Speaker, the point of order is well taken.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 50 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Florida shall have the remnant of his 50 minutes to address the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Florida. But, Mr. Speaker, while Florida, as she fell from the fingers of the Creator, bore the stamp of the beautiful and the lovely and seemed to be all that could be desired in the way of an earthly abiding place for man, it must not be understood that she is nothing more than a garden of lovely flowers and delicious fruits. [Applause.] Untold wealth is embedded in her generous bosom. In agriculture her soil makes bounteous response to the friendly touch of the industrious husbandman; her rivers and lakes and the waters of the sea which lash her coasts are teeming with the best food fish in all the world [applause]; her forests yield annually millions of feet of the finest yellow pine and cypress lumber produced anywhere; her mines produce for home and foreign consumption millions of tons of phosphate every year; her ranges send into the markets of the world every year thousands of as fine beef cattle as are raised anywhere; millions of crates of oranges, grapefruit, limes, pineapples, and other tropical fruits and vegetables are shipped from within her confines annually to the markets of the world; she manufactures and sells annually more Havana cigars than all the other States of the Union; she has more seacoast and more navigable streams than any other State in the Union; and is the largest State in area east of the Mississippi River save one.

I might name many other of Florida's possessions, enterprises, and industries, Mr. Speaker, but will content myself with calling attention at this time to only one other. In this great age of development and progress Florida has been no laggard in the matter of building railways. From Pensacola, in the northwest corner of the State, to Jacksonville, in the northeast, runs the magnificent Seaboard Air Line system, and from Jacksonville to Tampa, in the extreme south, is the Seaboard and the Atlantic Coast Line, while the interior is covered with a network of railways reaching and serving every community. While the promoters and builders of these great railway systems have in large measure been actuated by the hope of ultimate profit, still they are each and all of them entitled to great praise for their part in the material upbuilding of this magnificent Commonwealth. There is another railroad within the State of Florida, Mr. Speaker, to which I desire to particularly refer at this time, which is distinctively a Florida institution. The Florida East Coast Railroad Co. began its career a little more than 20 years ago, with its northern terminus at the city of Jacksonville, its course lying along the eastern coast and its destination being the extreme southern end of the eastern side of the peninsula. Jacksonville, the queenly mistress of the majestic St. Johns, is destined at no distant day to become the undisputed metropolis of the South Atlantic seaboard. But let another, better able than I am, tell you of this live, hustling city among the magnolias and the pine:

He who arrives for the first time in Florida has reason to be delighted with the portal through which he makes his entrance into the land of rapturous surprises. The city through which he passes at the threshold of the State gives cheering prophecy of the beauties that lie within.

The almost magical development of the east coast has converted Jacksonville into a gateway through which one enters the real Florida, which begins with old St. Augustine, then quickly follows the other beautiful winter resorts which dot this summerland.

The city of Jacksonville, with a population of nearly 65,000, is beautifully situated on the magnificent St. Johns River, about 22 miles from the Atlantic as the stream flows. Its water front is in the shape of a crescent, the river changing its course twice within the city limits and in a distance of three miles. The harbor is naturally superb, and time will see Jacksonville one of the large cities of the United States. It is the northern terminus of the Florida East Coast Railway, where connection is made with the Atlantic Coast Line, Seaboard Air Line, Southern Railway, Georgia Southern & Florida Railway, and the two coastwise steamship lines.

Along the line of the Florida East Coast Railroad, after leaving Jacksonville, the eyes of the traveler feast upon visions of beauty not surpassed anywhere in the world. The country traversed has been aptly termed the "American Riviera." Here is St. Augustine, the place where Ponce de Leon landed nearly 400 years ago, in search of the fountain of perpetual youth, full of old Spanish landmarks, the oldest city in America, and with her modern improvements, palatial hotels, and incomparable climate the social Newport of the South. [Applause.]

Then comes Daytona, sitting like a queen on the banks of the Halifax in a perfect garden of palms and flowers, enticing lovers of the beautiful to tarry long within her gates. [Applause.] The traveler also passes Ormond—beautiful Ormond, with her marvelous scenery and the greatest automobile beach course in the world.

New Smyrna, Titusville, Cocoa, Rockledge, Fort Pierce, and numerous other towns greet and charm the traveler as he is whirled through this delightful region on his journey toward the far south over the line of this twentieth century railroad, equipped with every possible modern convenience. Later, down the line he comes to Palm Beach, "the garden spot of the world." It is utterly impossible to describe Palm Beach. No painter has yet been born who can faithfully reproduce on canvas the ravishing beauty of Palm Beach. No master of language is blessed with a sufficient vocabulary to impart to those who have not seen it the slightest conception of its surpassing loveliness.

Within two hours' ride of Palm Beach the traveler comes to Miami, the "Magic City" of Florida. Scarcely 15 years old, Miami has a population approximating 12,000 people. She has paved streets, sewerage, electric lights, electric cars, and every possible improvement and convenience known to our modern municipal life. In addition to this, she is situated in a rich fruit and truck growing region, with both rail and water transportation to the markets of the world.

A little distance below Miami begins that portion of the Florida East Coast Railroad which, crossing the sea from key to key, connects the mainland of the State of Florida with the island city of Key West, and which, as an engineering enterprise, ranks second only to the great Panama Canal. For more than a hundred miles across the sea this magnificently equipped railroad has been constructed at the instance and under the direction of the master mind of Henry M. Flagler, the greatest developer whose presence has ever blessed our fair State. A few short years ago the entire eastern side of the State of Florida was practically an uninhabited and an unexplored wilderness, but Henry M. Flagler, with that keen foresight which has signally characterized his long and successful business career, saw the vast possibilities of that region, which only required the developing touch of transportation facilities to bring them into full fruition. Having satisfied himself that the task was worthy of the effort, Mr. Flagler called to his aid Hon. Joseph R. Parrott, now president of the road, and other able lieutenants, and actively began the great work. Difficulties innumerable were encountered, and as it was not so promising an enterprise in the way of fair returns on the capital invested, Mr. Flagler builded the great highway with his own private means, and I am told that no bonds were ever issued and sold until the stupendous task of building the extension across the sea was begun. As descriptive of this colossal undertaking now so happily reaching a successful end, let me read an article which recently appeared in Everybody's Magazine. It is from the pen of Mr. Ralph D. Paine and is thoroughly accurate. He says:

A speck of reef set far out in a tropical sea, much nearer to the coast of Cuba than to any port of its own country, Key West has long been the most remote and incongruous city claimed by an American State. In days gone by its spongers, wreckers, and Spanish-speaking cigar makers no more dreamed of being linked with the mainland by rail than do the people of Honolulu. Until 10 years ago their nearest home port was Tampa, 250 miles up the Gulf of Mexico. Then the Flagler railroad, which had been advancing down the strip of wilderness along the Atlantic seaboard, brought Key West within reach of Miami, 157 miles away, by steamers, which skirted the far-flung chain of the Florida keys.

This chain of islets swings off from the Everglades of the mainland to stretch down into the Atlantic and the Gulf as far as Key West.

No part of the western frontier is so primitive and unpeopled as was this swarm of seagirt islets, until a man with a dream of creative achievement and millions of money to make it come true resolved to build a railroad to Key West. It was to be a railroad which, in a distance of 130 miles from mainland to terminus, should bridge no less than 30 miles of open sea and cross at least 30 miles more of submerged keys and lagoons.

A railroad to be pushed, with stupendous difficulties and at an expense of $25,000,000, through the Atlantic to a remote reef—what is the reason for so monumental an undertaking?

The answer lies in Henry M. Flagler's belief that the island of Cuba will some day strike its destined gait of prosperity and growth. For Cuba is the true objective of the railroad to Key West. When the work is finished huge ferries will carry solid trains to and from Habana, and a through rail route from New York to Cuba will be completed.

Henry M. Flagler's purpose to stake his fortune on Cuba was the direct result of his visit to the island in company with Sir William Van Horne. Here he learned the scope of the plans for the railroad development of Cuba which seethed in the mind of the great Canadian builder. The man who had constructed more than 5,000 miles of wilderness road with 50,000 men in less than five years, who had shoved the Canadian Pacific through to the coast, was sanguine of doing great things in Cuba. Mr. Flagler grasped the fact that his Key West road would be an important transportation link in the far-sighted plans of Sir William Van Horne. He found that the Ann Arbor Railroad was conveying trains of 26 freight cars on ferries over 112 miles of water on the Great Lakes. It was therefore feasible to carry solid trains between the United States and Cuba. And every inland sugar planter, who had to ship his crop by rail to tidewater before finding steamer transportation, could be offered a competitive rate for handling and freightage over the all-rail route via Key West.

The railroad to Key West will serve other purposes as well. As the quickest route for mail and passengers between the United States and the Panama Canal, as a long stride nearer the commerce of South America, as a military and naval base of immense strategic importance for coming generations, a terminus "farthest south" appealed to Mr. Flagler's imagination. Moreover, the idea of a seagoing railroad was in the last analysis, regardless of the immediate impetus, the logical climax of his prodigal investments along the east coast from Jacksonville to Miami. Here he had already spent $30,000,000 in 20 years, extending his chain of magnificent winter resorts farther and farther south and binding them together with his railroad. To make of it a through system he had inevitably to push it on toward the Gulf.

This work has been the more dramatic in that the problems were new and of most unusual difficulty. Between some of the keys the tracks must be carried on concrete viaducts so long that from a car window a passenger would be out of sight of land, the horizon closing down to the ocean rim to east and west. The work would have to withstand storms and high seas for mile after mile where there was no barrier to check the assaults of the Atlantic. The construction plant must be put afloat, thousands of men quartered in boats instead of camps, the work inspected in tugs and launches, and a huge fleet maintained for building a railroad. As one engineer summed it up, "It was bound to be a web-footed proposition from start to finish."

Yet, even as the railroad stands to-day, it is an immense undertaking successfully wrought out and in operation. Within three years this highway of steel was finished for train service for a distance of 110 miles below Miami, or to within 47 miles of Key West. On the remaining stretch over 80 per cent of the construction work has been done. The United States has been given a new railroad terminus far out in the open sea as her southernmost port. From the present terminus at Knights Key steamers run in winter to Habana, 122 miles away, reducing the journey from New York to Cuba to two days—a service as fast as the regular train ferries that will later operate between Key West and Habana, a distance of 90 miles.

The story of this railroad building is quite like a tale from the Arabian Nights. The viceroy chosen for the work was Joseph R. Parrott, a broad-shouldered, square-jawed man in his forties, who was already carrying enough responsibility to bury several ordinary men. He was a Yale athlete of such ability that he had rowed on five university crews and had been substitute on a sixth. Coming to Florida fresh from the Yale Law School in 1885 to take a berth with the legal department of one of the first railroads in the State, he was induced to join Mr. Flagler's interests 20 years ago. He became the one-man power in direct management of property interests which expanded year by year until they had reached vast proportions. He had to create the East Coast Railroad system and to equip himself to handle the greatest hotel interests in the world, on top of which tasks he was requested to put a railroad into Key West and was made wholly responsible for the undertaking. Fourteen thousand people have been on his pay rolls at one time in Florida. And the enterprises controlled by him have involved from thirty to forty millions of capital.

The first plan for extending the railroad south of Miami attempted to find a way across the Everglades to Cape Sable, the southernmost tip of the Florida Peninsula, 80 miles from dry land. Engineering parties spent months at a time in this, the most hostile and inaccessible wilderness left in the United States. They suffered such hardships and torments as have been endured elsewhere only in the heart of Africa. One outfit had to be rescued by a relief expedition and was found on the edge of starvation. The survey was carried through to Cape Sable, the land was found impracticable for railroad building, and the field of action was therefore shifted to the route across the keys. Locating this erratic line was an Alice-in-Wonderland task of itself. The surveying party had to do most of its work afloat, and some of its men were lost among the hundreds of keys for days at a time. They wished to utilize as many of the keys as possible, and finally selected 41 across which to run the road. There were gaps between them so wide, however, that towers had to be built for sighting the instruments. In other words, these distances which must be bridged were so great that the curvature of the earth hid the rodman on the key from the man with the transit.

The next step was to find the right construction engineer, for upon this official's ability the enterprise must hang in the final issue.

Down at Tampico a fragile-looking, sunburned man of middle age was puting $3,500,000 belonging to the Mexican Government into a pier half a mile long. He was a taciturn, almost diffident person, this quiet little engineer, J. C. Meredith by name. But he knew all about reenforced concrete; he had built bridges all over the face of the map, and his hard-working brother engineers considered him a man of much courage and resourcefulness. After he had finished with his tremendous Tampico pier he was summoned to confer with the viceroy, J. R. Parrott. The latter expected the engineer to demand a month to look over the ground and another month or so to make up his mind, but to his questions Mr. Meredith replied:

"I'm ready to begin work this afternoon, but I'd like a few days to go home to Kansas City and pack some things and see my family, as I'll have to be on this job for several years."

As soon as the engineer reported for duty he began to study the surveys of this extraordinary railroad proposition. It had many novel aspects. He had to determine, beyond guesswork, the effects of hurricane winds and tides, to provide the greatest possible wave resistance along every foot of the way, to study and tabulate the data recorded of every West Indian hurricane that has swept the keys since records have been kept, and to lift his work wholly out of the field of experiment. Having satisfied himself that his work would stand the test, he made the plans for his mighty viaducts, and the foremost engineering authorities of this country looked them over and said they were flawless.

Then Mr. Meredith began to build his railroad by the upside-down process of digging more than 30 miles of navigable canals through the Everglades, which barred his progress from the mainland to the keys. These canals were dug by powerful dredges which were built in holes in the ground. Then water was let in to float them, and they began to eat their way toward the sea, throwing up the mud between them to make a railway embankment and leaving two canals in their wake. The grading of the first 17 miles was accomplished in this fashion. The bedrock was so near the surface that the dredges sometimes stranded and could no longer dig their own way. But presently Engineer Meredith evolved a system of locks by which the stranded dredges were floated over the barriers of rock.

Meanwhile Mr. Parrot was assembling men and material for the invasion of the keys. At one time he had under charter every available freight steamer flying the American flag on the Atlantic coast, and still being short of vessels he had to import cement from Germany to get bottoms to carry it. The crushed rock ordered for the viaduct construction filled 80 tramp steamers, 200,000 tons of coal freighted another imposing fleet, and the cargoes of steel, lumber, and supplies bannered the sapphire sea with the smoke streamers of deep-laden tramps. Camps and a transportation system had to be arranged to care for 5,000 men far from the mainland along a hundred-mile fringe of keys, with no more than two deep-water harbors in this distance.

Efficient labor was in demand the country over, and good men did not want to fight mosquitoes in the isolation of the Florida keys. Thousands of good-for-nothings, the dregs of sodden and broken humanity, had to be shipped from northern cities out of sheer necessity. Negro labor could not be obtained in such prosperous times, and the law forbade the importation of blacks from Nassau and Jamaica or Spaniards from Cuba and their own country. The sources of labor supply depended on for digging the Panama Canal were closed to this American enterprise. Hordes of "hobos," as they were classed, were sent out of the camps as worthless, or because they refused to work at all, scorning even to earn the $12 advanced them for transportation. Although the average number of men employed was about 4,000, the pay rolls show that 20,000 men were carried to the keys in three years.

The process of weeding out laborers was costly and disheartening. When the working force had been hammered into something like efficient shape a hurricane swooped down on the keys in October of 1906, and not only tested to the utmost the work of the engineers, but made havoc in the ranks of the laborers. The construction had been well advanced, however, and embankment, trestle, and viaduct stood the trial without serious damage. The soundness of Mr. Meredith's plans could have had no finer vindication.

As swiftly as possible after the hurricane the working force was reorganized, and from the clusters of tents and houseboats the working gangs swarmed by night and by day to carry the white trail of the grade southward. Across most of the northern keys they found a bed of coral and limestone. This was blasted and heaped in embankments by hand labor as in ordinary railroad construction. Many of the open water stretches were crossed by means of ramparts thrown up by suction dredges, which trailed their long lines of pipe across the channels like huge serpents. These crossings were riprapped with rock to buttress them against the wash of the sea. Behind the graders came the track-laying gangs, coupling up one key after another to the mainland, while the camps ahead of them were shifted farther south to invade the islets that swam in wonderful opalescent lagoons. From the top of a derrick frame the finished grade stretched across the green keys like a straight white ribbon.

The line came at length to a bay 4 miles in width between Lower and Upper Matecumbe Keys. The land is so low that the farther shore almost dipped below the horizon. Across this body of water the railroad pushed its way on trestlework and rock embankment, all of which will be filled in solid before the work is finished. Then the builders brought up at Long Key, where the first great viaduct was constructed.

For 2 miles across the green sea this structure towers as a wall of masonry carried on noble arches—180 of them, built of concrete reenforced with steel. It has the aspect of a Roman aqueduct built of solid stone, and its colossal strength and dignity of outline are framed in a setting altogether lovely. Seen from the shore of Long Key, its arches march across the water, away, away, until they seem to run sheer into the horizon with nothing to mar their splendid isolation. Save for the low keys at either hand, there is no land in sight anywhere, nothing but ocean shifting from green to blue as it rolls to the Gulf Stream on the one hand, and melts into the western sky on the other. A passenger on a train crossing the Long Key viaduct may be lucky enough to see a school of flying fish skitter past and a porpoise or two hurtling in chase of them. The cost of this one link between the keys was a million and a half dollars for 2 miles of construction, but unless a ferry is operated so that the traveler may see it from a distance, he will miss any adequate view of this noble and impressive structure.

While the prevailing shallowness of the water has made it possible to throw up mile after mile of embankment, it has made the problem of transportation immensely difficult. It was found impossible to approach, even in light-draft launches, many of the keys, on which hundreds of men must be camped and fed. A flotilla of stern-wheel steamboats from the Indian River and the Mississippi, reputed to be able to navigate in a heavy dew, was imported to operate on these lagoons, but they ran hard aground miles from the places they sought to reach.

In the 40 miles from Bahia Honda south to Key West the island formation differs as radically from the keys to the northward as if they belonged to another geological period. The coral rock disappears and what land there is is of solid limestone. The keys are so low that many of them are mere swamps densely covered with mangrove. Throwing up embankments across them has been largely a matter of dredging. And for this particular kind of dredging Mr. Meredith designed a new species of amphibious monster. All known methods of railroad building had to be discarded. To feed any of the usual types of dredge with coal and fresh water was impossible, because supplies could not be transported over the shoal lagoons and landed within reach. Therefore Mr. Meredith evolved a startling innovation by using a gasoline engine as his dredging power. Six of these gasoline dredges were built on barges. Where there was enough water to float them they waddled across the key, indefatigably heaping up embankments. When they came to a dry bit of going they were yanked ashore, mounted on wheels, slid onto a steel track, and so progressed as effectively as ever.

When J. R. Parrott reported to H. M. Flagler that there was no room for deep-water terminals along the harbor front at Key West, he was told to go ahead and make enough dry land to serve his purpose. This in itself was a princely undertaking, for it meant filling nearly 200 acres of salt water, a good-sized town site, with material dredged from the bottom. Suction dredges pushed their tentacles far out to find mud enough to feed their hungry maws, and an army of men built a sea wall of rock to contain this filling. Already almost a hundred acres have been made terra firma, and the outline map of Key West has been considerably altered.

The dredging was in charge of Howard Trumbo, one of the greatest dredging engineers in America. Here the great terminals are now being constructed, and here will be built the immense system of wharves, capable of berthing 40 large ships.

In behalf of the citizenship of the beautiful island city of Key West; in behalf of my own constituency, the people of the second congressional district of Florida, and in behalf of the people of the entire State, I tender you, Mr. Speaker, the membership of this House, and all the people of America, an invitation to visit us on the occasion of the celebration of the completion of this gigantic enterprise. [Applause.] Our homes will be opened to you; our hands will be outstretched to greet you; our hearts will throb gladly as we extend to you a generous, hospitable, old-time southern welcome. Those of you who come by rail will have the opportunity to travel more than 400 miles through the greatest congressional district in all the Union, over as magnificent a railroad as exists anywhere within the broad domain of the Republic. [Applause.]

Passing through the great congressional district which I have the honor to represent in this historic Chamber, you then enter the next best congressional district in the United States—the first congressional district of Florida—so long and so ably represented by my distinguished colleague, Col. SPARKMAN, chairman of your Committee on Rivers and Harbors. [Applause.] After traveling a short distance in Col. SPARKMAN'S district you reach the city of Key West. What shall I say of Key West, Mr. Speaker? I would that I were gifted with the power to properly describe this beautiful island city, situated far out in the sea on an island about 1½ miles wide by 7 miles long, where the cool breezes, laden with the health-giving ozone of the sea, maintains a delightfully pleasant temperature the year round; in the center of the great ocean highway between the two Americas; the greatest manufacturing center of fine Havana cigars in this country, and the natural Gibraltar of this Republic in our southern seas. Key West, now that she is bound to the mainland by steel rails, over which must go the commerce of this continent, will in the near future assume an importance in our national life second to only a few of our great cities. [Applause.]

Time will not permit me, Mr. Speaker, to indulge in an extended review of the facts which determine the importance of Key West in all its varied aspects, but there are a few things to which I desire to call attention briefly.

Key West is the nearest United States port to the Panama Canal, the distance being only 1,075 miles; she is the gateway from the United States to Cuba, Central and South America; she is the "American Gibraltar," defending the Gulf of Mexico, the Caribbean Sea, and all the approaches to the Panama Canal; and this position makes her the logical point for this country's greatest naval base; she has one of the most powerful wireless telegraph plants in the world, which is capable of communicating with the Panama Canal direct; she is an important coast-artillery post, strongly fortified; she has large fleets of vessels engaged both in the general fishing industry and in gathering sponges for commercial purposes; she has immense shipping interests, local, coastwise, and foreign; and she has the most magnificent natural harbor on the Gulf of Mexico, being, as it is, 25 miles long, with a channel from 1½ to 2 miles wide, with not less than 32 feet of water and large areas over 40 feet deep.

This harbor would accommodate a fleet of the largest battleships in the world, and would form a harbor of refuge for the enormous commerce of the Gulf of Mexico, and some idea of the immensity of this commerce may be gleaned from the statement that at present there is an average of much more than 4,000 vessels annually through the Straits of Florida. Possessed of all these and many other advantages, among which is its delightful climate, the thermometer seldom registering above 90 in summer and below 50 in winter, Key West is destined to become in the march of progress one of the really great cities of this continent and one of the most important military points in all the world. [Applause.]

Such is the city, Mr. Speaker, which proposes to celebrate the completion of this great oversea railway enterprise which links her with bands of steel to the mainland of our common country. She is peopled by 25,000 of as brave, loyal, hospitable, God-fearing, and patriotic American citizens as can be found anywhere within the broad domain of our great Republic. [Applause.] Probably the first person to call the attention of the country to the feasibility and desirability of a railroad to Key West was the Hon. Stephen R. Mallory, sr., who was United States Senator from Florida and afterwards Secretary of the Navy of the Confederate States. As early as 1856, in the Senate of the United States, Mr. Mallory strongly advocated the construction of a line of railroad from the mainland of Florida across the keys to Key West as an urgent military necessity. Nothing came of this, however, until some 35 or 40 years later, when Henry M. Flagler came upon the scene. I fear, Mr. Speaker, that we are usually too prone to wait until the cold hand of death has been laid upon a public benefactor before rendering him that meed of praise which is his just due. [Applause.] If Mr. Flagler had not engaged in his Florida enterprises, but had continued to devote his untiring energies and his great mind to the accumulation of money along the lines of business in which he had amassed his great fortune, he might have become the richest man in all the world. That he was content with the wealth he had acquired and seemed to be inspired with the high resolve to use it for the benefit of humanity was greatly to his credit and to the lasting benefit of Florida and the country at large. He has by his investments added millions of dollars to the taxable wealth of Florida; he has given employment to thousands of people; he has opened up a vast empire to settlement and habitation, and to-day thousands of happy homes in what was only yesterday a wilderness attest the wonderful and beneficial work of this man. [Applause.] Through all his career in Florida no worthy man or cause has ever appealed to Mr. Flagler in vain, but his benefactions have always been bestowed with that entire lack of ostentation which always is characteristic of real generosity and an unselfish desire to benefit humanity. Mr. Speaker, piles of stone and figures of bronze have been placed in our public squares and parks all over this country to attest to posterity the virtues of our great men in all lines of human endeavor. This is well. Henry M. Flagler has builded a monument more enduring than stone, bronze, marble, or brass. This great highway of commerce, the Florida East Coast Railway, 500 miles nearer the Panama Canal than any other railroad, and bringing us in close connection by rail with all of South America—the only railroad of its kind in all the world—will be Henry M. Flagler's monument, and with an eloquence which no human tongue can approach will it tell to future generations of the man of wealth with the brain to conceive and the great love for his kind to execute so stupendous an undertaking. Mr. Speaker, I trust that when the resolution I have introduced, giving national recognition to this great enterprise, shall come before the House for action not one single voice on either side of the Chamber will be raised against it. It is worthy of congressional recognition and marks an epoch in the progress of the age. [Loud applause.]

During the foregoing remarks of Mr. CLARK of Florida, the following occurred:

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois raises the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and forty Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. A call of the House is ordered. The Doorkeeper will close the doors. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas). Two hundred and eighty-three gentlemen have answered to their names—a quorum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were reopened.

Mr. CLARK of Florida resumed and concluded his speech.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the conference report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask a question of the gentleman from New York in reference to the report.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. MANN. I understand there is one item in the report in reference to the claim of the University of Idaho.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Senate receded from that amendment.

Mr. MANN. Was there any understanding on the part of the House conferees that that item would be agreed to in a general appropriation bill hereafter?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Since the gentleman from Illinois calls that to my attention I wish to make this statement. It has been asserted that there was an arrangement made, not, as I am informed, with the conferees of the House, but between some gentlemen in another body, that one of the considerations for the withdrawal of opposition to this conference report elsewhere was an arrangement that the item appropriating $500 to reimburse the University of Idaho for expenses on a premium bond necessitated by the issuance of a duplicate draft would be provided in a regular appropriation bill in another session. There was no understanding or agreement of any character whatever about that item had with the managers on the part of the House. If any such arrangement or understanding has been entered into it was without the knowledge of those representing the House.

The conferees on the part of the House took the position that this bill proposed not to correct the journals of a former Congress, but to correct errors which were made by enrolling clerks in inserting in appropriation acts items that were disagreed to by the managers of the two Houses. Those errors were to be corrected by repealing the provisions which appeared on the statute books as having been enacted. The conferees on the part of the House insisted that it was imperative that these provisions should be repealed and made no terms for obtaining the legislation.

Mr. MANN. It has been asserted, as the gentleman has just stated, by some one somewhere that the joint resolution was for the purpose of correcting errors in the Journals of the two bodies. Is it not rather for the purpose of making the law comply with what the Journals show?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Undoubtedly, the Journals of the two Houses show that the items in fact had never been agreed to by the managers of the two Houses. Instead of correcting the Journals the purpose of the resolution is to make the acts conform to what actually transpired as shown in the Journals of the two Houses. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 269) which I send to the desk and ask to have read. (H. Rept. 140.)

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the remainder of this legislative day shall be devoted by the House to the consideration of such bills as have been reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia; the bills to be called up in such order as the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia may elect: Provided, however, That nothing in this resolution shall be construed as interfering with conference reports.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, on that I move the previous question.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is evident to the Chair that there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question will be taken on ordering the previous question on the resolution just reported.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 178, nays 80, answered "present" 10, not voting 118, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The previous question is ordered. A quorum is present, and the Doorkeeper will reopen the doors.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose any discussion is necessary, and we might as well vote on the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Illinois desires to discuss the matter, of course I will have something to say about it.

The SPEAKER. Each side is entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not need to reserve it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do not know; but I always want to be certain.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman from Texas how much time he yields to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not expect to detain the House but a moment. I did not make a point of order upon the resolution offered by the gentleman from Texas, although I think it is subject to a point of order, and I call attention to it. I do not know whether the point of order would be sustained if made. It has, however, been the practice of the House ever since I have been a Member of it that the Committee on Rules has no jurisdiction to report a resolution for the consideration of any measure until the House has referred to that committee a resolution offered by a Member of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman will permit an interruption right there, I will say this was done.

Mr. MANN. I understand, if the gentleman will pardon me, while such a resolution had been referred to the Committee on Rules, and while it would be proper for the Committee on Rules to have reported a resolution in lieu of the resolution which was referred to it, that was not the course which the Committee on Rules pursued. It offers an original resolution emanating from the Committee on Rules without regard to any resolution having been referred to it.
